The Dangers of Indulgence.

Contributed by W. C. T. U.

On one point all are agreed about alcohol—its fascination. Temperance advocates of all shades of opinion, and the opponents of temperance of all degrees of hostility, they all acknowledge that alcohol is like a trap, carefully concealed. Before one knows that he is in danger, he is caught.

It is not like a spring trap, that catches its prey with a sudden startling snap. Rather, it is like those traps in the form of a steel box, furnished with a commodious and alluringly baited entrance funnel. The victim finds no difficulty in going in. He gorges himself upon the bait. Then he turns to go out, and lo! in every direction he is confronted with murderous prongs, all pointing inward!

Upon another point in regard to strong drink all are agreed: it is safe to leave it alone. No one ever lost money by leaving it alone, or health, or friends, or position, or character, or happiness. No one ever left it alone and then was sorry he did so. No mother ever urged her child not to leave it alone. No father, in naming the elements of success for his boy, ever inserted the saloon. It is always safe to have nothing to do with intoxicants.

Most men—probably all men when they begin to use alcohol—think they are stronger than it is. Most men are sure they can go up to the danger point, but not a step over it. Farther on, they come sadly to realize that the best proof of strength with regard to alcohol is to leave it alone. Everyone admits that there is danger. Needlessly to incur danger is to tempt God; it is a form of suicide, of self-murder.

When one "indulges" in strong drink, what does one indulge? The lower part of one's self always, and always at the expense of the higher. There is no danger in "indulging" one's appetite for good books, or fine pictures and music, or profitable conversation, or deeds of charity, or Bible-study, prayer, and missions. The danger is always in indulging one's lower self.

There are other dangerous indulgences, and all of them akin to intemperance. The man who is imprudent, whether in thought or act, is a drunkard of a most bestial kind. So is a gambler. So is a glutton. So is a miser. There is a perilous intoxication in the pursuit of money, or the ambitious seeking after place and power. An alcohol drunkard is not by any means the only kind of drunkard.

And "at the last it stings like an adder." There is an "at the last" to all indulgence in evil. There is a time when it passes the indulgence of God, a time when the trap springs and the victim is caught. Oh think of that, young man, before you begin any evil or doubtful course! Do nothing of which Christ would not approve. Take Him with you wherever you go. Make His desires and pleasures yours; and then the more you indulge them, the richer will your pleasure become, and the more invincible your strength.

County Council

It was exactly twenty minutes past seven on Monday evening when the rapping of the warden's gavel called the members of the county council of Grey to order in the Council chamber in the town hall. Every member responded to his name at the roll call and after the reading and confirming of the minutes of the last session in June, Warden John McArthur of Ploverville, delivered his address. He said there was nothing more pleasing than to see all the members from the county present and in good health. When they last met he hardly expected to see all here again; but he was pleased to know that they had all been spared and permitted to meet again. No matter how they might disagree in the council, they could all agree outside and be friends. He rejoiced in the fact that this was a free country and everyone had a right to think and act as thought best. He congratulated them on the fine weather and the abundant harvest they had enjoyed. They had all had a good harvest and he knew whereof he spoke. There was a great deal of business to be transacted and it would require diligent attention to complete it by Saturday. There were many matters of importance to come before them and he hoped they would deal fairly, squarely and expeditiously with them. He wanted all accounts in before Tuesday evenings in accordance with the by-laws. They could all enjoy themselves but they had all their own duties at heart and he wanted to finish up everything by Saturday. Among the matters coming up for consideration would be the proposed change in the law regarding the composition of county councils, the grand jury's presentment at the recent assizes, numerous claims for damages owing to alleged defective bridges and culverts and the House of Refuge trouble regarding the electric light supply. With regard to the latter he thought it very unfair that Mr Minnis should be deprived of his money so long. He had been supplying electric light without remuneration for a year and a half and if Markdale did not pay it the county should do so. In conclusion the speaker again thanked them for the honor they had conferred upon him and hoped they would deal with all matters in a prompt and satisfactory manner.

The clerk presented a large budget of communications and accounts which were referred to their respective committees and will appear in the reports.

TUESDAY

Tuesday's session was devoted chiefly to the reception of accounts and reports quite a number of the former were for damages alleged to have been sustained owing to defective bridges and culverts. Mr S J Parker, county treasurer, presented his report on road and bridge expenditures as asked for at the June session, and Mr A Stute submitted a special report relative to the Stinghamton bridge.

WEDNESDAY

A deputation consisting of Rev James Lediard, Rev Father Buckley, Dr Lang and Messrs W H Smith and James McLaughlan addressed the council asking it to pass a bylaw levying a rate of one and a half mills on the equalized assessment to build an addition to the general and marine hospital at Owen Sound. The reception of a number of accounts and the adoption of reports as presented by the different committees occupied the attention of the councillors for the remainder of the session.
