THROUGH THE SUEZ CANAL. We were four hours going through this little trough of water. And all that time there was nothing to see but the cold, dim desert and the empty, low-hanging moon. Towards the end we sighted a watch-fire-small and lonely in the desert. There was an Arab near it wrapped and hidden in a long, trailing cloak. He sat with his chin on his knees and looked our way. Two camels nunched beside him, slowly chewing. They swayed their long necks to stare at the lights. Mournful, solitary-looking beasts they were. They crouched on the desert with their knees folded under them, and we passed near enough to see them flap their scrubby little tails. But the man never moved. We watched him till he slipped out of sight.

Season for Toleration.

(Boston Transcript.) Don't scold the youngsters if they take a much longer time to do an errand than you I'm in Toronto to attend think is required. Being human, you can't expect them to resist the temptation the shop windows offer. You can't resist it yourself, and you realize, possibly, that you are a little nearer perfect than most of your friends. You are late these days at | blood, and much of that purity depends every appointment, even at keeping one with the dentist, because of the holdups the windows prove. Before one you hover, weakly promising yourself to be good at the next temptation and pass it with averted eyes. But you break your promise; at the very next attraction you stop and admire and your journey up or down town is a continuous performance of promises broken. So don't you think you could for the next week or so be a bit more tolerant to those lower than you in the scale of righteousness?

A novel aparatus designed for use in reanimation has been used, it is said. wipth success by a Hungarian scientist. This it accomplishes by the use of abdominal shields such as are shown in the accompanying illustration, reproduced from the Scientific American. The apparatus consists af a lateral vaulted shield fitted with flexible extersions which can be fitted air-tight on its edge, while te convex part carries an aperture to which a tube can be fitted. Now, this shield is placed above the abdomen and the lower part of the thorax, so as to cover as with a bridge the whole of the former, while the tightened edge is made to rest on resisting parts of the body. In the space left between the body and the shield and which is inclosed air-tight. the air is alternately drawn out and forced in by means of suitable

The fact that in this novel process his lungs are filled with blood at the same time inspiration occurs is of the highest importance, as it greatly facilitates the exchange of gases.
