Precious Faith. It is "precious faith," costly in itself. is not merit in faith; how can there be the fact that we have "fled for refuge," and have found safety in the cleft of the Rock? No, faith is not in the least a recommendation of goodness before God. It is the clasp on the life-belt when the man is drowning; the rest of the rescued in the arms that bear him to the shore; the standing in peace behind the shield which our champion presents to the foe. It is the very opposite of merit; it is our recourse to merev. By just because it is all this, it is "precious" in the blessings it brings. By a carico of perpendicular ladders we than descended to the tiller-room, a huge space filled with most massive machinery for moving the two ruddels under the control of the delicate gear operated by the little wheel on the bridge 400 feet away. This place, too, in direct opposition to the character of all similar spots that I have been in, was both noiseless and a 3,000 ton ship, doing their spiriting as gently as a perfect gas engine.

To reach this place we passed through the mess-deck, which is also in accordance with the prevailing note of the ship-roomy and comfortable before that of any other warship that I have ever known. And it must be remembered that my inspection was under the working conditions. Nothing was or could be prepared for me. But by this time I was weary both in body and mind.
