--- British admiralty is planning for immense naval manoeuvres in the North Sea, by the combined home, Atlantic and Channel fleets. This, taking place at Germany's front door, is no doubt meant for a pacific hint which speaks louder than the Hague conference. Britannia will rule the waves yet a while. Japan, alone among the nations, is to be allowed to send representatives to witness the manoeuvres. We would do no such thing if we had the say.

The laborious efforts of the leader of the Opposition to construct a platform for his party once more reveal the fundamental absurdity of the party system. Why go about to construct an artificial antagonism of principles when no natural antagonism presents itself? What would you put in the place of party?—the de-fenders of the system ask. The simple answer is, nothing. Let each constituthe executive, as practically it does now, only not upon party lines. That surely is the natural course. To what this artificial system of parties struggling for place and pelf has led, and is more

The Lion and the Bear

An important treaty has been made by Russia and Britain in the interests world peace, each side sacrificing somewhat but rendering war complications unlikely for many years. The treaty, offensive and defensive, with Japan had its origin in the fear of Russian aggression by both powers. This Japanese alliance with Japan is of small importance to Britain, though still of immense importance to Japan. This fact is of great value at the present time when amity is likely to be strained by wholesale Japanese immigration into British Columbia. Japan will give pause before pursuing a course likely to offend her ally and hinder the growth of a profitable trade with Can-

But when a contract between nations, like a partnership between individuals becomes awkward and unprofitable to one of the parties its practical value diminishes. However binding in its technical obligations it may be the alliance between England and Japan is still of immense importance to Japan, but its terms have become highly embarrasing to Great Britain. England will not break her compact except in some conceivable emergency which will involve the world's peace. She would, of course, deny any intention of doing so even then but England would veto by every influence in her power any helligerent rolling of the state of the stat diminishes. However binding in its veto by every influence in her power any belligerent policy of her ally to
