Self-Education of the Teacher

(By C. W. Bolton, Neustadt)

Education being looked upon as training or development of power, includes work of any kind which gives increased power. A teacher may pursue a line of training such as a course in art, that is, in the various phases of culture, gardening, games, a study of music in its branches, a higher certificate, courses, and indeed anything which develops increased power. Not only is a teacher benefitted by such but a certain amount of it is necessary to prevent mental loss.

Arnold said that he did not want his pupils to drink from a stagnant pool but from a running stream, hence the engaged to prevent such stagnation. Some years ago a man who had been a school teacher for life, stay in one school and go on in the same old way, he would become a fossil. A school time ago a gentleman said to me that he had taught school for fifteen or twenty years and was no use for anything but teaching and then all know that this opinion largely prevails. So far as my judgment is of experience, and probably then in his person, who is no use for anything else, a round development give to his pupils getting into such a rut. Teachers' conventions and inspectors' visits have an influence, but the former is only once a year and the latter twice. What then all-round work, training, development of mind active, instead of being good for nothing, be good for anything? All lines of mental work are open to the teacher. In business he can get in teaching, if he finds that he cares to engage in business. Think of Principals Grant in his declining years, a man who had been a preacher, a divinity professor for years being offered $25000 a year to finance the C. P. R. Lesser examples are numerous. But on the other hand one who has not had fully for years cares more for advancement in his own profession and here is especially now when the opportunities for teachers have just been many times increased. Many persons prefer a small salary, but more influence, are not ambitious for the things of life and are content with a quiet, unobtrusive life. To such are open such training as teachers' reading courses, specialization in some department of school work such as drawing, household science, manual training, etc., or possibly a study of some of the fine arts—music, painting, needlework, etc., and they obtain much pleasure and interest in this way will enable you to write and speak with ease and fluency.

In such a course of study or reading care must be taken not to break down rather than build up strength. Physical strength must be cultivated, good recreation must be had at any cost. Hours of study must be regular and not too long, variety in study must be sought after, then hours of leisure and rest are quite unnecessary. It is worry that kills, rather than work, and nervousness and indecision rather than definite pursuit.

By pursuing in this way a definite course of study or reading, the student acquires a mental strength and power of expression which make him pre-eminent a good teacher. He knows and by the student who has had the knowledge poured in by some professor. He has drawn to himself and assimilated most thoroughly his knowledge, and has had to express his thoughts. He has searched for knowledge in books, not had it laid down before him by the lecturer and taken down in notes. He has had to arrange and classify his knowledge for essays and exercises and put it down in writing. His mind is strengthened and his power of self-expression increased. The self-educated man, like the self-made man of any kind, is a strong rather than a cultured man, and by some is regarded as not a truly educated man. But strength and beauty or grace go together to a certain extent and each has its place.

One can distinguish an educated man by his language. There are those who use vulgar, profane, ungrammatical and verbose or simple strong pre-arranged mental patterns and these persons are easily classed accordingly. A beautiful mind is shown by its expression in language and action, a strong mind by the stand taken on all subjects. Education shows itself in the most readily. A fossil mind is revealed by its thought and language. It looks at everything from one standpoint, is argumentative, one-sided, slow to move or to change, the language or speech, the expression of the thought, is always the same. A course of study such as I have suggested, a great amount and variety of reading—close, deep and studious reading, develops individuality, originality, power of criticism, variety, reserve, force, depth and places good models before one. In reading there should be a study of the greatest essayist, the Bible, and all the great masters in prose and verse. The style, the language, the plan, arrangement, should be studied and criticized, abstracts should be written on a plan of your own, and then your own work compared to the original and criticized.

Practice is essential, regular practice daily, however long or short the time. Write letters, descriptions, diaries, essays, exercises, historical biographies, persons for whom they are written, and ending for such piece of work, and work straight toward that end with no digressions, using simple, thorough and good composition. Revise thoroughly spelling and punctuation being absolutely sure it is correct. Re-write the clumsy sentences or lectures, them out and see how that will do. Get a friend's criticism, not that of a person who represents the prospective reader. Read it aloud to this person read it aloud to you. In this way you will find numberless faults. Lay it away for a time and again revise it. Exercise extreme care in copying. If you are to give a piece of work to a friend as then you will see it from a new standpoint. Read something you have written months before as perfectly as you then could, and you will find weaknesses in it. This is a sign of progress. Constant care and practice in this way will enable you to write and speak with ease and fluency.

By pursuing in this way a definite course of study or reading, the student acquires a mental strength and power of expression which make him pre-eminent a good teacher. He knows and
