Nature Study

By Miss Annie McKenzie, Varney Words are too often regarded as the only means of self expression.

Pictures, diagrams, illustrative blackboard sketches, models, paintings, have their own particular value.

Some view Nature Study from a purely intellectual standpoint. Nature study has its emotional side, and any view point which disregards this is too low from which to see.

The purpose of Nature Study is to widen the horizon of the child and to multiply his points of conscious sympathetic contact with his environment.

The ideas gathered from each Nature Lesson should be expressed in as many different ways as possible.

By examining a thing with a view to modelling it, the senses of touch and sight are called into play.

In many schools the subject of Composition is a difficult one.

Nature Study and Drawing are so closely related that it is impossible to teach the one without the other.

Through Nature Study the child gets ideas of the things about him; through drawing he expresses these ideas; thus thought and expression are united, and he gains therefrom accuracy of perception. But this is not the only gain, for the more accurate the perception the more power the pupil will have to express himself in both spoken and written language.

From the first drawing as a means of thought expression should be emphasized. If the child knows that it is possible for him to express in drawing certain facts about the object being studied, his interest in it will be much greater than otherwise.

Making different things is one of the simplest forms of expression, one, too, which receives the least attention.

Nature Study, touching as it does, the soul of the child, affords opportunities unknown in any other field for the training of facial expression and tone of voice.
