Prayer.

O Thou who art the King eternal, immortal, invisible, dwelling in light that is innecessible and full of glory, in Thy condescending mercy Thou dost deign to visit Thy children upon earth. When Thy people come together and with true desire invoke Thy presence, then the unseen gates are lifted up and the King of glory enters in. Grant to us. O God. clean hands, pure hearts, that as often as we meet for worship we may indeed nesend into the bill of God and stand in His holy place. Save us from wandering thoughts and from profane imaginations, and let the words tations of our hearts be acceptable it Thy sight. And let the spirit of worsh always regard ourselves as consecrated to Thy service. Let soul and body be laid upon the altar as living sacrifices unto God. Hear this prayer which we offer in the prevailing name of Jesus. our great high priest. Amen.

No man can be at his best until yields. His natural impulse is to fight tiod and to seek sin, in rebellion against God's loving call to turn from sin. ### DIAMOND MAKING.

PARIS DIVIDED ON A CURIOUS CASE OF CONSCIENCE.

Should Sir Julius Wernher Open Sealed Paper of Lemoine?-Night Flight of Airships an Element in Future War-The New York Auction for Voices.

Paris-The discussion of Sir Julius Wernher against N. Demoine in connection with the manufacture artificial diamonds occupies columns every day in the Paris papers without either the writers or readers getting nearer to the truth or even to definite ideas in regard to the probabilities of whole transaction. Everybody comments on the power of mystery over human beings, which seems as great as ever. Every one links Lemoine's secret paper with the Dreyfus secret dossier, the Humbert secret safe and Druce's secret of the coffin, but nobody has mentioned Cassie Chadwick.

The Gil Blas, carrying out a project formed at a literary dinner party, puts forth for public discussion to-day case of conscience of Julius Wernher. The project is the outgrowth of a proposition put forward by one of the diners, a noted writer, who made a physical analysis of the possible state of mind of Wernher as the guardian of such enormous interests as the diamond company represents, after learning that Lemoine had been in prison. It was suggested that Wernher would believe it to be his duty as a business man to open secret; the secret envelope, Finding that this envelope contained no formula of value, Wernher then, according to the hypothesis, would have felt justified in proceeding at law against Lemoine and would be able to stand in court and challenge Lemoine to consent to a judicial opening of the envelope and declare, "If you find anything serious within I will give you 400, 600 francs." When a man uses such language, says the writer, he is sure of his

It should be stated that the writer predicted that Wernher's excuse to himself, aside from business exigencies, when he resolved to open the envelope was that he was an honest man and could trust himself and that if there should be a valuable formula within the envelope he would neither disclose it nor profit by it, nor yet proceed against

The writer's proposition was stoutly contested by the diners, who held that Wernher as a man of honor could not readers of the paper who took part in strike 8,000,000 matches every minute business is business Wernher would feel half of these are ignited in this country. terests he is called upon the guard de- larger match bill than any other nation manded such a course.

large quantities of meat, and had washed everything down with many a flagon of the finest malmonsie, they would set themselves to the production of a widow.

Light conversation upon the existing good or evil of the day would bounce from lip to lip, and back to lip again. And many a goodly jest would unthinkingly slip out during the course of the conversation. The light conversation and the goodly jest would be duly noted by the editorin-chief, who would distribute them, then and there, to different members of the Board, with orders to turn in their write-up before the end of the breakfast. The artists seldom waited for subjects to be assigned to them, but would illustrate jokes which had caught their fancy with a knife, fork, or pencil, upon the table cloth The table cloth would be saved until the following day, when copies would be made of their sketches. WINDMILL SIGNALLING.

Valuable for Military Purposes, the Dutch Government Has Discovered. To the casual observer viewing a Chat, Dutch landscape there is nothing to arrest the attention in the fact that possibly one or more out of a dozen windmills in sight are to all appearances simply standing idle, while the others continue their never ending task.

If one watches the sails of the idle mills closely it may perhaps be noticed that they move slightly from time to time and then remain for a while at a different angle. If this is so the miller is in all probability engaged in holding a conversation with the proprietor of the other mill, which may be miles away, in fact, possibly barely visible on the hor-

Quite recently the Dutch Government carried on a series of experiments in order to ascertain the value of windmill signalling for military purposes, and were surprised to find that communication could readily be established with far distant centres and that confidential messages could be sent on from one mill to another and so forwarded throughout the length and breadth of Holland in an incredibly short time by means of secret codes known only to the millers them-

These codes have been handed down from generation to generation and jealously guarded from outsiders with all the intense conservatism for which the provincial Dutch are proverbial. Apart, however, from these secret codes, understood only by the millers and local groups of mill owners, there exists a series of windmill signals with which every one of the inb - istants of the country districts is familiar. At times, for insume, a mill may stop working suddenly and the miller be seen to come out and with the aid of a long pole with an iron book at the end, like a gigantic boathook, reach up and drag down the descending sail until the arms assume a certain position. Every one knows immediately that some accident has happened to the wooden machinery
