It was at Alexandria that Lord Lynne became so dangerously ill that his life was despaired of Then Sir Allan, like a true friend, went to the rescue, and nursed him through the long and tedious malady, and at his urgent request went with him to the east. But it was not without some sacrifice that Sir Allan Leigh did this. He had hoped, when the year of mourning expired, to make Agatha his wife; but she asked him to wait. She did not regain her spirits; the secret she kept weighed her down.

After the funeral, Agatha and Lady the Chase and life went on slowly and if he sees at times a look of sadness Florence came home, Evelyn returned to sadly until Sir Allan was summoned to of suspense to pass through. Mrs. Lynne, now and death of that beautiful, brilliant sister were ever before her; the words of that last letter semed ever in her mind. If she could have shared her secret with Allan, it would have weighed less heavily upon her; but that could not do. She never betrayed trust, although for many years it clouded and shadowed her life. The faintest shadow of doubt was never thrown upon the fair name of Inez, Lady Lynne.

The first happy event that dawned was the marriage of Evelyn Leigh. Somewhat to the amusement and surprise of Agatha, her friend made, during a visit to London, the conquest of her old admirer, the Marquis of Hortington. It was Evelyn's great likeness to Agatha which first attracted him, for he had never forgotten the sweet and gentle girl he had first loved. Evelyn Leigh went to London to spend some months with her aunt, Lady Merston. Here the young lord saw and learned to | choice at last. love her. No one was much more surprised than Mass Leigh herself.

Sir Allan could not return for the weddoing. He could not leave his friend. Letters and presents came from the East, and he promised that, as soon as Lord Lynne recovered, they would return to Lynnewolde. So Evelyn Leigh was married from her aunt's house, and Lady Florence took Agatha's place as her chief bridesmaid.

Lord and Lady Hortington were very happy. He thought no one in the wide world was so beautiful or so clever as his gay, pretty little wife; and she, with her good, clear sense, and quick, bright intellect, helped him to fill his responsible position with great credit. There are not many happier people in the world than Evelyn and her husband.

"It hardly seems four years, auntie," said Agatha to Mrs. Lynne, one morning as they walked along the smooth green lawn of Lynnewolde. "How much older and wiser we are then when we left here for London on that bright spring morning! I never thought so much sorrow lay before us." "Four years is a long time when one is young," replied Mrs. Lynne; "even to me, each year has seemed an age. I have longed so earnestly to see my son again."

"Will he be much altered, do you think?" asked Agatha; "and, oh, auntie, will he have forgotten her?" "No," said Mrs. Lynne, "my poor boy will never forget her; but he is young and naturally light-hearted. I have great hopes for him. I trust you to see him settled at Lynnewolde, a happy husband, with children growing around him, for he has suffered enough.' "But not so bitterly as I have done," thought the young girl to herself. sist in an adequate water supply at a

A few days ago a buyer from the States gave the high price of two thousand dollars to a farmer near Brockville for one cowil this is believed to be the highest price ever paid for a Canadian cow. What made the animal so valuable? Granted that she was a model of beauty and an exquisite type of her breed, the fact remains that her actua! performance largely helped to effect the sale. She has a record of 121 pounds of butter in 30 days. The records, those figures down in black and white, assisted in making the price. When farmers generally commence to keep records of individual cows, we may hope to develop not only many more such excellent specimens, but a general improvement in the production of the average herd. Records alone can furnish the information necessary to enable intelligent selection of the promising cows, and the rejection of those that are not profit-able. Such selection, coupled with more liberal feeding, will repay any farmer abundantly. Haste Explained.

The young couple sprang from the vehicle and hurried up the steps. A moment later they pushed open a door and appeared before the startled justice. "Sir," gasped the young man, " will you kindly marry us as quick as pos-"Ah, an elopement?" quoth the wise

"Nothing of the sort," cried the exasperated youth.

"Eh! Then what's the rush?" "I'll tell you!" shouted the young man, "there's a taxicab waiting for us at the door, and we're losing money every minute!" Then the justice got busy.
