His friends here, and they are many, regret the loss of Mr and Mrs Russell from the business, church and social life of the town, but have nothing but the heartiest good wishes for their future success and welfare.

Effect of Local Veto.

The Toronto "News" is making an investigation into the working of the Local Option law in Ontario. The method employed is not without interest and novelty.

Two of the paper's most experienced reporters have been commissioned to go into local option municipalities and write of conditions as found there. One is a convinced friend of local option, and the other an advocate of regulation by a license law.

Orillia was the first town visited, and the results of the investigation appear in last Saturday's "News." Mr Gordon Rutledge, the Local Option advocate, quotes Chief of Police Reid as saying: "I'm not a temperance man, but the sooner any town abolishes the bar 'the better.' The chief said, moreover, that the town used to be disorderly, but was no longer. Drunkenness is now practically unknown, whereas there used to be twenty-five or thirty in the cells of a night, now two is the limit. These come from Atherley, a 'wet' town two and a half miles away. Some drive over to get drunk there, but few compared with those who formerly drank over the bar at Orillia. Others get beer in the local brewery, but these also are comparatively few in number. The amount of liquor consumed altogether has been greatly reduced. Strict enforcement of the law is effectively making bacon 'out of the 'blind pigs,' before the licenses were cancelled there were seven hotels in Orillia, a place of not more than 7,000 inhabitants. Each had an average bar trade of $65 per day. That made a weekly expenditure on drink of $2,730, or over $140,000 a year. This money only helped the hotel men; much of it was taken out of circulation. Now, the merchants say, the money goes to them and to the banks. The town is quieter, but it is more prosperous. The new order for one thing has practically done away with the treating system. Every one who voted for the measure holds that it has worked successfully, and many of those who voted against it acknowledge their mistake.

On the other hand, the believer in license, Mr W. M. Findlay, finds a great deal of drinking in Orillia. In his opinion, "In abolishing the bar the town of Orillia has merely transferred drinking from public places to drinking in its homes. Liquor has been forced into the homes of the town and into 'the homes of the surrounding country.' This is really the only point he makes, though he does not change on it to over a column of newspaper print. "Parents who drink in the home," he wisely says, "set a bad example to the children," and assumes that, "when liquor goes into the home the mother will drink it as well as the father." He believes that when liquor is used in the home, children are given an occasional glass; whereas very few bars will sell liquor to a minor. He says there are few 'blind pigs,' as the local brewery and the town of Atherley supply all the drink that is needed. He testifies that a drunken man is a rare sight in Orillia streets; that as much beer is drunk now as before local option came into force, but that, "when men drink in their own homes, and drink often, they do not drink as much at a time—rarely to intoxication." In passing, it may be of interest to compare this with the old stock argument against local option and prohibition, that drinking in the home, being surrounded by no legal restrictions, is bound to produce more drunkenness. Mr Findlay found that the amount of strong intoxicants in Orillia is not large, and attributes this—of all causes—to the supposed fact that when beer and porter can be obtained so readily, the drinkers have no craving for "strong stuff." In fact, Chief Reid attributed the falling off of the "drunk crop" to the absence of the "lumber jacks," who used to make Orillia the scene of pay-time carousals, and who were not to be seen in other towns, where liquor was retailed. He found several hotels in Orillia giving first-class accommodation. He also found business good, but one business man said that this was just a natural recovery from the recent depression, and not due to local option. The most remarkable feature of Mr Findlay's testimony is its endorsement of so many claims of the supporters of local option. The measure has decreased drunkenness, has put a stop to disorderly drinking, has better hotel accommodation, nor general business.—Witness.

Tuesday morning Miss Kate McDonald left for Saskatchewan to assume charge of a school in the West, in place of the late Mrs. McDonald in the Saskatoon district. Thus does Ontario suffer by the alluring demands of the new provinces. Miss McDonald has proved herself a teacher of great ability, and her many friends here will wish her every success in the new land. Miss Mary McArthur, Dornoch, accompanies her on a visit to friends near Calgary.

Mr. HUGH McORMICK, Pittsburg.

Mr McCormick, who is visiting his mother and sister and other friends near here at present, is an enthusiastic Pittsburger, where he has been for many years and done well. He kindly left with us some views and literature regarding the "Smoky city." Its romantic and warlike origin, its wonderful industrial growth, its educational progress, &c., &c., which tell of the amazing energy our neighbors put into every phase of their national life.
