At last she secured the River House, and they went thither. One of the first things that Huldah did was to select a room of which she herself could always keep the key. This she furnished in white, and therein she placed everything that she was to have worn on her wedding morn. "If ever I am tempted," she said, "to pity or forgive, to love or to trust, I have only to enter that room."

She was utterly indifferent about her own health and safety; she simply longed for death as a release from an utterly wretched life. So she lived entirely cut off from the outer world, and the first external influence that stirred her was Mrs. Neville's kindness.
