Physical Rewards of Self-Control. | the teeth, agitate slightly so that To those who contend that self control belongs to the moral rather than to the physical side of human nature, it can only be said that no one yet knows how far these two overlap, and that much treatment of physical conditions has to be based on moral conditions, and vice versa. It is safe to say that the de licate poise of physical health is maintained only by self-control. Health is based on good habits and good habits are the fruits of self-control. For each of us day passes without many opportunities to test our strength of will. You have decided that you will not nibble between meals. Time and again you have found out that the penalty for that indulgence is indigestion, headache, or a bad complexion. Then comes that glossy white box of the very purest candy, or the slice of such unusual layercake, or just one ice-cream soda, and you fall again. You have learned that late hours are followed by wretchedness the next day, and you have promised yourself that ten o'clock shall always see you read for bed. A little self-control would close that absorbing novel unfinished, or cut short the exciting and nerve-exhausting discussion. But it is, perhaps, in the matter ROBBED WOMAN OF WHISKEY. of our moods that we may see most clearly how disastrous is the lack of Gang Smashed Her Premises, Broke self-control. There is always something to worry about in the happiest life, but worry and health do no go together, and abandonment to a fit of the "blues" can upset the finest digestion in the world. Many young people constantly use the word "nervous." It sounds better than "cross," but to their friends the words seem to mean much the same thing. Bad temper or low spirits usually have a physical basis, which should be sought for and removed; but we should control the outward manifestations of the mood out of consideration for those about us, and the inward manifestations for the sake of our own well-being. You cannot have perfect health if you weekly yield to anger and worry and low spirits.
