A Story Showing What Dress Has to Do With the Affections

By Karl Sommers Copyright by American Press Asso-

When the Revolutionary war broke out the men who collected to fight on the patriot side came from the farm, number of the young people the workshop, the country store-indeed, from the then few simple avocations in which the colonists engaged. They were soldiers neither in training nor dress and were looked upon by the British well drilled and handsomely uniformed officers and men with the contempt regular troops entertain for houses stood a girl of seventeen, who had been sent out by her mother with a tin pan full of doughnuts. The cakes were nearly all gone as well as the men who had taken them when a young soldier, very pale and with large, deep sunken eyes, bespeaking illness, approached the girl, laid his musket against the fence and sat down on the mounting stone before the gate. There was one doughnut left in the pan, which the girl offered him, but he was too ill to relish it. He sat for a few minutes resting his head on the paims of his hands, his glance at the last straggling files of his comrades, arose and took up his musket to follow them.

But there was something that troubled him far more than his trembling limbs. He wore little of that which is the pride of a soldier-uniform-and what there was of it was torn and him sympathetically with a pair of tender brown eyes, and to leave her he must expose his rear, and from a hole in the seat of his trousers protruded a portion of his shirt tail. How could a soldier expose such ignominy? But while he stood deploring the necessity of doing so a darkness came before his eyes, he tottered, and the girl caught him before he fell. It was several weeks before the young soldier, Abner Wicks, was well enough to leave the farmhouse, and when he was his departure was made painful from the fact that he must leave his heart with the little girl who had nursed him. True, her mother had done the greater part of the nursing, but the daughter had done the loving. Lucy Barton was of an age when love comes easily and from many causes. In this case it arose from pity. Abner was but a year older than she, and he loved her because her eyes were brown and because she pitied him. It was a love that might be broken as easily as it had come or might endure when both, with locks white as snow, should totter arm in

One morning Abner took up his musket to go and rejoin his regiment. His moving away was not so embarrassing as it would have been a few weeks before, for Lucy's mother had patched the seat of his trousers. Nevertheless there was nothing in his appearance to inspire such admiration as is often given a soldierly man in a be-
