It has long periods of quiescence, for, according to tradition, it appears only every seventh year. As a matter of fact, however, it has appeared with more or less regularity any time within the last four years. It comes like a thief in the night, and in a few hours turns a fertile bottom into a generous lake that overflows the highway and makes of it a raging torrent. After keeping above ground for a few hundred yards it disappears as mysteriously as it came, and its subsequent course is not visible. A countryman whose house borders Dillingore, as the stream is called, told me it gave no warning of its approach, says a writer. I asked him if he had ever seen any water bubbling up, and he said: "No; the place will be dry overnight, and full of water in the morning, and that's all we know about it." He had no idea whether a wet winter such as this which followed a wet summer had anything to do with it. A similar epring exists near Croydon, in the Caterham Valley, known as the Woe waters, from the belief that its appearance presaged plague, famine, or war. Dillingore must be the
