TICKLING A SHARK.

Tickling a shark in order to make the fish amenable to capture is a singular practice among the natives of the island of Tahiti. A writer, who watched the sport while seated in a canoe manned by two where you can see to a depth of four or five fathoms, you catch a glimpse far down among the seaferns and coral cups of the long, lithe tail of a shark, and of a huge pectoral fin that sways continually with a sidewise motion, and sends up little ripples to the surface. The native diver picks up a coil of coacoanut fibre with a slip-noose already tied in it, seizes a knife in his teeth, and quietly slips into the water. It is done with wonderful skill. The native keeps close to the reef, and pulls himself down through the water by means of the sea growths till he is right over the waving tail. Slowly a black hand stretches out, and starting behind the pectoral fin, begins to stroke the sea-tiger. There is a faint movement of the body, and the fins sway

Again the hand moves forward, and as it strokes the fish, the other hand leaves the slip-knot hanging loosely near the spread of the tail. Then the native comes quietly to the surface, and the spectator breathes freely again. The sail is set, the steersman takes his place on the outrigger, and the diver in wave a red flag whin there was a the bow, with a yell of "Hula!" green wan handy!" pulls hard on the rope.
