Myrlads of Mosquitoes.

It was six o'clock and darkness was falling. I made haste to bathe at the brink of the river and then to get under my mosquito curtains. And not a moment too soon. As the light faded with the soft suddenness of the equatorial regions, insect life emerged for its nocturnal loves and feastings. its dances, music, flights and battles. And for many of these revels, blood and especially human blood, is a longed for prize. If an incautious hand or a restless foot were pressed against the curtain for a moment, a cloud of mosquitoes immediately settled on it and drove their relentless trunks into the veins.

No European who has not himself seen them could credit the myriads of mesquitoes which haunt these forest streams, and as the few inhabitants of these regions are all suffering from malaria great care has to be taken. The noises that all these insects made seemed to rise and fall in waves of sound, now becoming intensely shrill, now dying away to comparative stillness. My companions had fallen asleep in their hammocks; from the river were heard only faint rippling sounds, and I composed myself for sleep. Never was there a greater delusion, it was indeed a nuit blanche. Mysterious scamperings came from the edge of the forest above me; a great splash came from the river and
