Remarkable Photograph of a Close Shave in the Air Secured by a Paris Photographer.

With only a few flying machines in the world and the whole ocean of air to fly in, one would think a collision of aeroplanes to be next to impossible. And yet more than one of such accidents have occuria and bidding good-bye to his wife really there would seem to be less excuse for an encounter in the three-dimen sional space of the aeroplane's domain than in the two-dimensional planes of travel that land and sea vehicles must adhere to. The aerial pilot may leap over or dive under his adversary; and yet with no fixed lanes of travel it is evident that much confusion is liable to arise, particularly as as flying machines are very fast and there is no system of signalling between them.

At the recent aviation meet at Heliopolis, a collision between two aeroplanes was so very narrowly averted as to send thrills of horror through the spectators. In this case the proximity of the aero-Rainbow up to Behring Sea to carry planes was due to the fact that they were rounding a pylon and were trying to hug the course as closely as possible. There were three aviators in the air, Guillaux, Chevillard, and Olivier. Suddenly Guillaux was seen to approach Chevillard, and it looked as though he would surely strike the right wing of Chevillard's biplane as it was banking for the turn. By the barest margin the monoplane cleared the biplane, and the two aviators continued their flight, undaunted by their harrowing experience.

By rare good fortune one of the correspondents of Paris L'Illustration happened to catch the two aeroplanes with his camera at the very moment when the collision seemed imminent.
