I called, asking who was in the room, but received no answer. The person must have gone out very softly, for I could not hear the slightest sound. I lay wondering what woman had taken sufficient interest in me to kiss me. Was it from motives of pity or because she had been especially attracted to me? I was inclined to look at it as a frenk of some mischievous chit to set me wondering. After all, it must have been something of a temptation for her to kiss me since she could do so without being found out. I was removed to my home, but it was several weeks before I was permitted to go out with my eyes uncovered. I asked to be shown the house where I had been carried after the accident and found it an eminently respectable residence. I went in to thank whoever had received me and found an elderly lady who congratulated me upon my recovery. Now, what I had really gone there for was to find out who kissed me. But how? Could I tell the lady that I had been surreptitiously kissed while defenseless in her house, thus giving away whoever had done the deed? I should have liked to go on with the conversation, but considered that It would be presumptuous for me to do so. The girl made no further remark, so the conversation dropped She got out before I did, and I should have been glad to join her, but would not for the world have taken advantago of so small a matter as lending her a nickel to force an acquaintance.

I had forgotten the episode when one day I received an envelope containing a theater ticket. It was not marked complimentary. It had evidently been purchased at the box oface. I went there and asked the ticket seller if he could remember who bought it. He looked at it and said that he could not. I went away wondering who had favored me, but feeling sure that the person would turn

I went to the play hoping that I would have my curiosity satisfied before the evening was over, but I did I saw no one whom I suspected the audience, and no one made himself or herself known to me, had fancied that I might receive a pleasant surprise in seeing some old friend take a seat beside me who would turn out to be the donor of the ticket. The seat on either side of me was filled with persons I had never seen before. A young man sat on my right, a middle aged lady on my left. Each was with another person, but no one of either comple did I know or had even paid any attention to me.

I went home mystified. One evening I was putting on evening dress to go out when, slipping my hand into the right pocket of my dinner jacket, I felt a little oblong package. Withdrawing it, I took off the paper in maich it was enrolled and er's name and address on the cover. Opening the box and removing a layer of cotton there on another layer glistened a gold scarf ring.

Hew did the box get into my pocket? I pondered over the matter with no success. Then I remembered that I had fast worn the dinner jacket at the theater on the night I had used the mysterious ticket. It occurred to me that the young man sitting on my right pould have slipped it into my pocket. But whe should be have done so? He was a stranger to me and had the evening, land, he seemed to be a very preky gist, I remembered. The scart ring was a plain band of gold with a granter selling of five jewels. In the center of a square was a diamond. One day while visiting a picture gallery, passing from one room to anothes, I met the street car giri face to face. I had my scarf ring on, and her eyes fell upon it before they struck my face. She raised them and at once threw out the red signal Bowing her head, she attempted to dive past me. But I had had enough of this mystery and sprang directly in

The blood in her cheeks that had partly subsided again flamed up, and she made another dive for freedom, but I headed her off. I knew she was the girl who had kissed me. Well, it was all out, and I told her that nothing would satisfy me but a full statement of the case from the time of the bursting of that gun at the celebration that had suspended ss within me and enabled her to carry on this succession of surprises. She told me that I might call upon her and she would satisfy my curiosity. I made the call without any delay, and this is the story she gave

"The house to which you were carried was and is occupied by my aunt and uncle. I went there shortly after you were taken in and, seeing a crowd about the house, was in dread lest something had happened to some one of the family. My aunt told me of the explosion of the gun and your arrival. A doctor was then with you, washing out what had been blown into your eyes, and when he left the room he reported that you were in a more critical condition than afterward turned out to be the case. "I volunteered to go in and look out for your needs, and my aunt, who is a very nervous woman, was quite willing to accept my services in your behalf. When I saw a young soldier lying there grievously injured looking so

The young | SASH, DOORS, and all kinds man who sat on your right was my brother and commissioned by me to drop the scarf ring into your pocket. There, you have my confession. The wholething has been done for fun." I concluded that a girl who would take all that trouble for fun might not be hard to win by the object of her amusement. I acted on this opinion and found it to be correct,
