A Courageous Premier.

Mr Brewster, the new premier of British Columbia, and his colleagues made a pre-election pledge to abolish patronage. They were successful at the polls and appointed Dr Adam Shortt, Chairman of the Dominion Civil Service Commission to draft the measure, which ensures that the civil service will be based entirely on merit.

With all offices at present filled by appointees of opponents, it required courage to put this in force, for no doubt many party friends were licking their lips in anticipation. Here is the premier's bold words in introducing the bill:

"Patronage is the twin sister of corruption. There is nothing that I could say that would be too strong to express the sentiments of horror with which I regard this monster, which has been tolerated too long in this self-governing Dominion of Canada and its provinces.

"There are only two or three excuses offered for its existence, and I think I can easily dispose of these. They are party exigencies, the reward of party fealty, and a depreciated moral sense. How many and how hard I had it thrown at me in the past few months that so and so must not run here unless someone else gets this or that; this man must have something or we cannot expect to accomplish this or the other! I would say that if we are not here for bigger and better purposes than that, if the future of the party depends upon the politician who wants a job, then it is time to get out, and let someone else run the government who has not got to consider the petty, selfish demands of that sort of people."
