new routine. They are no "grousers." When the troops arrived in the British zone they were distributed over an area allotted to British units who had just come out of battle. The men of the two armies fraternized by the most cordial way. I imagine the Americans felt at first that they might be patronized by their elder brethren in arms. Perhaps the British veterans thought there might he manifestations of a "superior" by the newcomers.

Each had rather mistaken ideas about the personality of the other. The Americans found that the British soldier was rather disinclined to talk about his experiences; the British discovered that their new Allies were full of eagerness to "know things" and to be made free of the mysteries of the front. Gradually they became acquainted. You could see them sitting together in a field, discussing the relative merits of British and American kits. The British instructors found that they had apt and willing pupils. They found, too, that the latter were imbued with one idea-to kill Germans. "They will be good troops," said a British general to me, as a battalion marched into a railway station to entrain for another place. He eyed them critically as one company round at the sharp word of command and filed into the carriages.

"I've seen a lot of them recently," he continued, "and they have made wonderful, very rapid progres."

Energy From the Elements. The generation of electricity by means of the sun's rays, tides and the wind is quite possible mechanically. But, as such power is only available intermittently, extensive methods of storage are necessary. Again while many storage methods are possible, unfortunately, none has so far proved economically feasible. In the case of compressed air storage, for instance, the reservoirs necessary, whether wells in the ground or steel tanks above, would have to be of enormous size. The cost of these and the required electrical and mechanical machinery, together with the cost of energy in the numerous transformation steps necessary, would make the cost of the relatively small amount of power prohibitive. Alberta Department of Agriculture reports no lasting damage to crops in Edmonton district as a result of recent frosts.
