STORY OF THE PINK-TAILED TANK

A BRITISH LAND SHIP ON THE WESTERN FRONT

When His Majesty's Ship "Here We Are" Amused the Tommies and Terrified the Enemy.

Lumbering, rolling, dipping heavily into shell holes, heaving clumsily out of them, moving with a motion that can best be described as something between that of a half-sunken ship and a hamstrung toad, came His Majesty's land ship "Here We Are." Such was the appearance of a British tank that a writer in the Cornhill Magazine describes. It dipped its nose and slid headfirst into a huge shell crater in ludicrous likeness to a squat bull pup sitting back on his haunches as he is dragged into a hole, and then as the Here We Are's face and gun-port eyes and bentelbow driving gear appeared above the crater rim it still more ridiculous-

FISH OILS IN PAINT

specialties in | Excellent to Mix With Red Lead for Exterior Work.

Fish oil may be used to advantage as a vehicle for pigments in exterior paints. For interior painting, however, t is not satisfactory, as it gives off noxious gases for a considerable time after it is applied. Those oils which have the least of the characteristic "fishy" odor give the best results. Such oils may be used as vehicles for pigments to the extent of 75 per cent., the remainder of the vehicle consisting of linsed cil.

Fish oil is superior to linseed oil in smoked-stack paint or paint that has to be applied to hot surfaces, since it does not blister. It is also in demand for baking japans where a certain degree of flexibility is required. It is used, too, in the manufacture of enamelled leather and printing inks.

When red lead is mixed with linseed oil, chemical action follows which causes it to thicken up and become unfit for use in a short time. The addition of properly neutralized fish oil, will, however, prevent this hardening action and preserve the paint in a fresh and soft condition for many months,
