tained Highways of France. Returned soldiers, who took part in the "big push" during the autumn of 1918, will recall the frequent signs "Dry weather track." They were very useful, these tracks; not being marked on the map, the Hun did not have them registered, and even if he did discover one, it was easy to abandon it for another. Thus, as the weather was good on the whole, there tracks were quite serviceable. But, if it had

What would have happened to our Canadian roads under the same conditions? Alas! they are nearly all only "dry weather tracks." A good road is a road which is good in bad weather. In road construction, we are a century behind France, although we pride ourselves on being a very progressive people.

Worst in Oldest Sections.

It is not sound argument to say that Canada is still a "new" country. The fact is that some of the oldest sections of Canada have the worst

It is largely due to the continuance in force of an antiquated system of providing for public road-building and maintenance. The same system has been tried in England and found wanting and yet we refuse to profit by the Old Country's experience, which the Britannica describes as follows:

"The almost incredibly bad state of the roads in England towards the latter part of the 17th century appears from the accounts cited by Macaulay It was due chiefly to the state of the law, which compelled each parish to maintain its own roads by statute labor, but the establishment of turnpike trusts and the maintenance of roads by tolls do not appear to have effected any great improvement."

Let us hope that the Canada Highways Act, passed at the late session. spells the end of statute labor and of 'turnpike trusts' in Canada. Tollgates have been found unsatisfactory elsewhere-let us abolish them here When governments themselves undertake the construction of roads, we may look for better days.

The Penniless Millionaire. The recent death of Andrew Carnegie has removed one of the most romantic figures from our midst. Carnegie was probably the second richest man in the world-Rockefeller came first-and gave away more than any other millionaire. His gifts totalled about $350,000,000. A curious characteristic of his was his dislike of parting with small change. Libraries -by all means! Twenty-five cents? That worried him. He often went about with nothing in his pocket, in order that he might not be pestered, and this once led to an amusing in-

Mr. Choate, then American Ambassador in London, was astonished to see Mr. Carnegie bursting in upon him "Look here, Choate, lend me a shill ing!" said Carnegie. Choate thought it was a joke. "But I might never see it again!" he protested. "Come come, it's no laughing matter!" retorted Carnegie. "My cabman's waiting at the door, and I haven't a

And off he went to bed

There is another story, however, which suggests that, when he wished to be courteous, Mr. Carnegie sat upon his dislikes and did not obtrude his personal opinions. He had sent for the auditor of the Carnegie Company Mr. Moreland, who subsequently became secretary, and during the consultation offered him wine.

"No, thanks, I don't drink," said Moreland. He then refused to smoke, and later on to play cards.

"Tell me why you do none of these things?" asked Carnegie, interested. "You've kept me working too hard all these years," replied Moreland
