Bluffing the Enemy. The "Dover barrage," which was devised by Adm, Hall of the British navy, has been called the most gigantic bluff of the war.

The British admiral made what seemed to be elaborate plans for an electric mine field across the Channel from Dover. The navy set out a num ber of surface lights and then Adm. Hall managed to sell the "secret" of the hypothetical barrage to the German spy system for twenty thousand dollars. In reality no mines were laid; but the German officials thought other wise, and for a long time kept their submarines away from the supposedly dangerous place.
