TWO ZEPP RAIDERS

DURING LAST ATTACK ON ENGLAND.

Observer Describes Thrilling Battles of Final Air Offensive, Aug., 1917.

The last serious attempt to raid England by a fleet of Zeppelins, which was made in August, 1917, is described mars the perfect in an article published in connection with the opening of the Aero Exhibition at Olympia, London. The writer

The coming of the Zeppelins was quickly made known to our air stations on the East Coast, and without an instant's loss of time a fleet of aircraft hurried into the air and away out to sea in search of the raiders. Among these aircraft were machines built for sea work and able to float if they had to come down on the water; but there were also land machines with wheeled under carriage and no device of any sort for keeping them affoat if for any cause they had to come down in the sea.

As our machines, in answer to the alarm of "Zepps reported," proceeded far out to sea on their search, bad weather began to blow up and add to their difficulties. Wind, thick weather and misty rain storms all added together to make flying over the sea a dangerous task, and hunting for Zeppelins in the darkness an almost impossible one. But the skill and perseverance of the airmon and the stanchness and reliability of their machines and engines won in the end.

Zeppelin is Quickly Set on Fire. The Zeppelin fleet was sighted and some of our machines closed for action. It was a two seater machine fitted with Rolls-Royce engine that tackled the first Zeppelin. The pilot quickly secured a favorable position for attack and the observer opened fire. The action was short and sharp; the first few rounds took effect and a small flame was seen to appear and run flickering along the port side of the ship's envelope. Quickly the flicker leaped to a gust of flame that swept along the side of the airship, and in a few seconds she was ablaze from stem to stern. Her bow swung upward for a moment, then dipped down again, and the airship, enveloped in a roaring torrent of flames, went plunging down toward a layer of thick clouds 5,000 feet below.

As she fell these clouds caught and threw back the lurid reflection of the blaze and lit up with quivering waves of hot, red, glowing light the whole circle of sky, the Zeppelin destroyer machine, and the two men in it leaning out overside and staring down fascinated to watch the finish of their handiwork. Next instant the remains of the airship plunged down into the clouds that closed solidly over her, shutting off the blazing light and leaving the airmen circling over a darkness that by contrast was black as 205 pitch.

Second Foe Craft is Shot Down.

Meantime the other raiders were being pursued, and a second one was closed with and brought to action, and again the machine that overtook her was a two seater fitted with Rolls-Royce engines. This Zeppelin also was shot down, according to the evidence of both pilot and observer on the two seater, although unfortunate ly there was some hitch or delay in crediting them with their victory.

The reason for this was perhaps that where the first Zeppelin destroy. er returned at once and made a report which was at once published, our second machine after the action had considerable difficulty in finding a way back and only made a landing far from the air station and too late for report to catch up to the first in publication. The second Zeppelin was pursued and fought a good many miles further out to sea than the first, and thick, rainy weather made it hard for the pilot to pick a course and find the land. He reached it at last and made a successful descent when his petrol was running down to its last gallons.
