COCK-FIGHTING IN SCOTLAND REVIVED

Since the close of the world war cock-fighting has been resumed on a large scale in Scotland. It had almost died out during the war. Fighting cocks are being bred in large numbers and constantly increasing throngs attend the fights between the game birds. Some of the contests are held openly, the police conveniently turning their backs, while others are held in barns and out of the way places. Photo shows two fine game cocks in action

A despatch from Ketmandu, independent State of Nepal, India, says that after a fight lasting half a century a law has at last been passed there abolishing sati, or the suicide of a widow on her husband's funeral pyre. Sati is now an offence under the law of Nepal, and inciting to it and abatting in it are punishable of-

The practice of sati is as old as the Sheatras, the sacred writings of the Hindus. Close on three centuries passed in India before attempts by Akbar, the famous Mogul Emperor, resulted in any steps effectively limiting it. Finally, in the time of Lord William Bentinck, nearly half a century ago, the right of a woman to take her life on her husband's funeral pyre was limited to wives of certain age.

Later this law was amended and sati was forbidden where a wife was about to become a mother or in the event she had minor children. Thus the wall of ancient custom and religious usage was broken down, until at last the right of a wife to take her Lord Milner, upon whose report on own life at the death of her husband
