They have been found several hundred miles below the southernmost latitude of the British Isles, and prove a very serious menace to vessels which have to cross their track. The terrible fate of the Titanic has been that of many another noble vessel, though, happily, without proving so disastrous to human life.

Mist or fog, too, will magnify a berg immensely, just as a fog in the Arctic regions has been known to make a fox look like a white bear.

Popular Ideas Set Right.

There are, it is true, bergs of gigantic size to be seen in the South Atlantic and Indian Ocean; but, so far as the Northern hemisphere is concerned. it is interesting to note that Franklin relates that one of the largest he saw was not more than 149 feet high.

Another famous Polar explorer has stated that rarely does an iceberg reach higher than the masthead of a modern sealing or whaling vesselsay, 90 to 120 feet. Occasionally, however, a spire of ice will rise much
