As Mrs. Wilson recovered her ba! acce and squared away for a surer stroke, Croaker swooped in through the open door and, with many muffled croaks, alighted in the centre of the table. In his black beak he held another glittering gold piece, which he dropped in front of Mrs. Wilson's plate. Then picking up a fat doughnut from the platter he hopped to the motto "God Bless Our Home" and perching himself on its gilt frame proceeded to appease his morning's hun-

Silence fell upon the family after the first gasp of surprise at sight of the gold piece. Even Anson checked his wailing to sit with his pale eyes wider open than ever they had been before and it was he who broke the silence which had fallen-broke it with a husky, fear-ridden voice as he cried.
