TWENTY-SIX LINES FROM LONDON.

Service is Constantly Being Improved and Safety is Unchallenged.

A new timestable of the aerial routes has been issued by the Aerial Travel Bureau, and it is now possible for one to look up air connections with most parts of Europe and North Africa, just as one would decide on a train. Successful service has made the time table a practical necessity.

There are twenty-six regular routes in operation in and out of Croydon airdrome, eighteen of which are conducted by Great Britain, four by France and four by Holland. Daily there are nine services to and from Paris, two scheduled to Brussels and two from Brussels and the same for Amsterdam.

The guide gives a graphic idea of the extension of aerial transportation on the Continent. Under Belgrade one reads: "Leave Croydon 4 in the afternoon, reach Paris at 6, leave following morning at 6, arrive Prague at 2, wait half an hour, depart again and reach Budapest 6 in the evening, reach Belgrade at 10"-which makes about forty hours of travel. This service is available daily and beginning in June will be further extended to Bucharest and Constantinople. Passengers leaving London later in the afternoon can fly to Warsaw via Paris in twenty-six hours. Another interesting route outlined in the guide includes stops in Spain and Morocco. It is possible to fly to Paris, take a train to Toulouse, catching an airplane at 9 in the morning. stopping at Barcelona and Alicante, spending the night in Malaga, and arrive at Casablanca at 10 the next morning.

Cheap as Train Transport. It is both possible and practical to leave one's hotel in London and take off in an airplane at Croyden within the hour, to go to any point in Europe, excepting Russia, by air. The terms are not only not exorbitant, but, figuring on the longer time required by trains, with sleepers, meals and hotels, actually amount to about the same, and in many cases are actually cheaper than travel by boat and train. The services are growing extensively, and it is believed the summer months will inaugurate a new era
