High Food Value and Pale ableness Merit Greater Do mestic Consumption

The herring is one of the world's most important food fishes an estimate of the world's yearly herring catch by the Department of Fisheries placing it at three billion fish or that number of pounds. The finest species are found, and most prob fically, in North American seas, particularly the colder waters of the North Atlantic, and scattered throughout these at one and the same time, are scores of shoals any one of which would go a long way towards supplying the whole of man's present day consumption of herring. When one considers their high food value and palatability, and the fact that they are obtainable in abundance all the year round, it is striking that exceedingly small amounts of herring are used fresh on the continent. There is room here for an educative campaign to be followed by vigorous business action. For the reason that it has not yet attained the popularity it deserves in this country, adequate told has never been taken of the herring fishery.

On the American side of the Atlantic where the herring catch has not assumed the importance it has long held in Europe, the fishery is entirely a shore fishery. The species obtains in as great abundance off the Ameriican shores as in the North Sea, but Canadian fishermen have never found conditions sufficiently inducing to invest in special equipment to fish off-

The herring is nevertheless an important fish in Canada and in the fisheries' revenue each year accounts for a substantial amount following only the salmon and cod. The catch in 1918 amounted to 1,764.223 cwts. valued at $2,295,611; in 1919 it was 1,-506,961 worth $1,624,730; and in 1920, 2,146,986 cwts. valued at $2,012,638. In the twelve months of 1921 841,575 cwts. were taken which sold for $632,-

New Brunswick accounted for about half a million cwt. and Nova Scotia and Quebec each for about half this amount. The catch of Prince Edward Island was relative-

Large Export Trade.

The Canadian herring would appear to be more in favor in other countries than at home and annually large quantities are exported making a brisk and steady trade. The fish leaves Canada in a variety of forms, fresh, frozen, canned, dry salted, pickled and smoked. In a canned state they go to the United Kingdom and United States, Australia, Brazil, British Guiana, Jamaica and Trindad. The dry salted in addition go to Hong Kong, China and Japan; the pickled to Barbados, Dutch Guiana and Porto Rico. The total exports in 1918 amounted to $2,974,282; in 1919 to $3,799,105; in 1920 to $3,409,498; and in 1921 to approximately the same

The extent to which the herring prevails in Canadian waters and the wide favor its high food value and palatableness have won for it urge a greater domestic consumption and more vigorous efforts to expand the foreign markets. Thousands of men find employment at the present time in the ishery and tributary curing establishments; the catch is strictly limited to inshore fishery which indicates the possibilities of the extent of the cet hand the employment created, were greater exploitation justified.
