Loudon's Ancient Stalls Vanishing.

The ancient stall-holders of London are fast disappearing. One by one flower girls (a woman of any age up to four score who sells flowers is a girl) and various street vendors who have held advantageous places for a longer time than any one remembers die and and no successors are named. There is not room for them in the bustle and hurry of present-day London life.

But London is the loser by the passing of these picturesque characters. Mother Kitchen and Mother Bury, the old Milkmaids of the Mall, have vanished, and "Fanny," a flower girl who sold fragrant blooms for more than a generation under the shadow of St. Paul's Cathedral, was borne to her long rest not long since, after services in Dr. Samuel Johnson's old parish church in the Strand.

A tiny apple stall beside the turreted gateway of Lincoln's Inn, the haunt of barristers in Chancery Lane, is the latest to disappear. The Inn has just celebrated the 500th anniversary of its foundation and the apple stall may well have been as venerable an institution in point of time. Old Mrs. Wise, who kept it, as her mother and grandmother before her did, has died and she left no descendant to come forward and claim a privilege granted by the benchers of the Inn for some reason long ago forgotten. Her mother was there in Dickens' time assisting her mother.

Dickens was a frequenter of this quarter of London and gave the narrow, dingy alley of Chichester Rents as well as other streets and alleys leading out of Fleet Street and the Strand, close by, such interesting associations that every week scores of pilgrims pass in and out searching for the originals of places made immortal by the novelist in his works.

Writing by the Mile.

The aggregates of all the things we do in life, such as the steps we take, the words we speak, the beatings of the heart, and so on, grow to huge

But have you ever asked yoursell how many miles you write in the course of a year? Sit down and see how many words you write a minute. If you are a brisk penman you will easily write thirty—a series of twists and twirls that, stretched out into a straight line would cover a distance of

An easy calculation will bring the fairly rapid writer to the conclusion that in forty minutes of continuous writing his pen travels a furlong, and that in five hours he covers a third of a mile with his pen-point. Supposing that a clerk writes stead ily for five hours during 280 days for every one of fifty years, he will at the end of his time have drawn a line of paper nearly four thousand miles long, or much farther than the distance from London to Toronto. An office staff of six men would in the same period put an ink line round the equat-
