BEGIN HERE TO-DAY.
The marriage of Dolly and Nigel Bretherton proves an unhappy one. When war is declared Nigel is glad to enlist. He leaves Dolly under the care of Mary Furnival. Nigel is killed and Dolly marries an old sweetheart, Robert Durham.

Dolly and Robert sail for America and word comes of the sinking of their ship. When Nigel's brother, David, calls to see Nigel's widow, Mary is ashamed to tell him of Dolly's marriage. David mistakes Mary for his brother's wife and asks her to come to live at Red Grange with him and his aunt. Mary is happy in her new home. Dora Fisher wishes to marry David. She calls at Red Grange and becomes jealous of Mary.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY.
She had worked herself into a thoroughly bad temper by the time she got to London; it was raining a little, and Dora hated rain. She took a taxi the whole way home, and kept the man waiting while she went into the house and demanded the fare from Monty.

He had just finished his dinner, and rose from the table, smiling with pleasure at sight of her.

"Well, dear?" He genuinely loved and admired his sister. He bent to kiss her, but she turned him a cool cheek.

"Have you any money? The taxi man is waiting."
His hand went at once to his pocket. "How much?"
She told him, and was quick to notice his frown.

"It was raining, and I hate rain," she complained pettily.

"You might have taken the tube half way; you know we really can't afford to have taxis everywhere."

"Don't be so mean!" She took the money without a word of thanks, and gave it to the maid, then she came back, tossing her hat and gloves on to the sofa. "I suppose the dinner isn't fit to eat, and I'm so hungry."

"I didn't expect you, or I would have kept it back. Tell the maid to bring you something. I thought you might not be home till the last train; I should have come to Euston to meet it."

"They didn't ask me to stay, and I'm sure I didn't want to."
"Did you see David?"
"Yes; he seems engrossed with Nigel's wife; they'd been out in the car together all the afternoon. I don't know what in the world you meant by calling her pretty."
"I think she is—or was—in a common sort of style."
"She's not—not in any sort of style! Fasty-faced thing."

Monty laughed.
"Don't be a cat, old girl; you're too good-looking yourself to grudge anyone else a small share."
"Well, I hate her—I hate the way she's got in with David and Miss Varney. I hate her ways—oh—"
She broke off exasperatedly.
Monty lit a cigarette. He knew his sister very well indeed in this mood, and always took refuge in silence.
Dora broke out again suddenly.
"I thought you said she had red-brown hair!"

"So she had. Has she changed the color then, or what?"
"She! She'd never trouble enough about herself to want to change the color. It's just ordinary mouse-brown."

"Humph! Then she has changed it, or else it can't be the right girl you saw," he chaffed her.

"Don't be such an idiot!"
She dropped into a chair, turning her back to him. As a rule she was quite good-tempered, but the afternoon had thoroughly upset her.

Monty smoked on imperturbably. Once he ventured to whistle a snatch of song. Dora rounded on him instantly.

"Oh, do shut up! A lot you care if I'm happy or miserable!" She began to cry shallowly.

Tears of sheer temper they were, but Monty thought she was really unhappy. He was sufficiently fond of David Bretherton himself to believe that he was the type of man a woman would adore. He came round to where Dora sat with her face hidden in a lace handkerchief, and put his arm round her shoulders.

"My dear girl, don't! I hate to see you so upset! What in the world has happened? Can I help at all? You know I'd do anything in my power."
She pushed him impatiently aside. "Oh, leave me alone!"
She looked up at him with resentful eyes.

"You ought to have persuaded David not to have that wife of Nigel's down there; you ought to have guessed what would happen. She's just worming her way in with everybody, and already they are beginning to wonder how they managed before she came."

"My dear child, isn't that just what I did try to do? Didn't I tell David? Didn't I do everything in my power?"
"You ought to have insisted that some other arrangement was made."
"Now you're talking sheer rubbish! I'm not David's keeper. Surely he has a right to please himself?"
Dora began to cry again, but this time Monty was unmoved. He had had enough of it. He got up and walked out of the room.

CHAPTER XXXV.
TIME, THE HEALER.

When David got back to the Red Grange he found Miss Varney alone in the drawing-room. She noticed the quick way in which his eyes roamed round the room as if in search of someone else.

"Where's Mary?" he asked abruptly.
"I really don't know, dear; she was here a moment ago."
Mary had slipped away when she heard the sound of the car in the drive; she did not feel as if she could face David again just then. Whenever she thought of her own impulsive words she felt as if her whole body were blushing.

What must he have thought of her? What moment of madness had made her say such a thing?
She had loved Nigel—and David was Nigel's brother.
But, though as yet she did not realize it, it was strange how lately Nigel had begun to fade into the background of memory. She would have indignantly denied it had anyone told her that it was so, but the fact remained, nevertheless.

Ruth, aged four, found grandma reading and upon inquiry was told she was studying her Sunday-school lesson. "Teach me my Sunday-school lesson, grandma," she said. So grandma taught her to say, "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for such is the kingdom of heaven."
A few days later Ruth's mother went upstairs to make the beds. The air was very cold from open windows, and Ruth was told to remain below, and a time Ruth called, "Mamma, I'm coming up."
Mother explained it was very cold and Ruth might become ill and she must remain below. But Ruth persisted and started to mount the first stair.
Mother heard the tiny step, came to the top of the stairs, and said, "Ruth, I forbid you to come up."
At this Ruth stamped her foot, and with flashing eyes her outraged self retorted, "Bid me not! Such is the kingdom of Heaven!"
There are fully 1,000 separate islands and islets in the British Isles.

Perhaps she had never loved him as deeply as it was in her nature to love; but he had been her one and only romance, and the tragedy of his death had lent a halo of beauty to his whole life.

Married to him, she would always have adored him, but in spite of herself her whole feeling towards him had unconsciously changed since his marriage.

Even to the broken-hearted, Time is a wonderful healer, and there is no truer saying of all the many penned by the immortal bard than that "Men have died, and worms have eaten them, but not for love."

And Mary was still young. She was beginning already to lose the wan, careworn look that had thinned her face when she first came to Red Grange. The quiet, healthy life, free from trouble, had done wonders for her; she slept well and dreamlessly, and woke full of energy, looking forward with almost childish anticipation to the simple events of the day.

Learning to drive David's car had given her tremendous pleasure; it was something so different from anything she had ever experienced—something so exciting.

David was speaking of the car when, a little later, she came into the room.

"Dora only just caught her train. The engine was running badly; it would hardly take Deacon's Hill at all—"
"He swung round sharply at the soft sound of the opening door."
Mary did not look at him as she came forward, but was painfully conscious of her quick heart-beats and flushing cheeks.

She sat down beside Miss Varney, and took up a book.

"Well, are you ready for another lesson in the morning?" David asked her.

He was determined that somehow she should be made to look at him, and speak to him; he wanted to meet her eyes again, but Mary did not raise them.

"I think it will be wet to-morrow," she said.

He laughed.

"What difference can that make? There is a hood to the car. And it was raining yesterday when we went out."

"Was it?" She felt strained and unnatural with him; she wished he would go away or sit down. He looked so tall and overpowering as he stood there, and she was so painfully conscious of his gaze bent upon her.

Suddenly:

"Miss Fisher wants you to go and stay with her in town," he said deliberately.

The words had the desired effect. Mary raised her eyes at once.

"Oh, I couldn't! I don't want to be rude, but I'd so much rather not."
"You don't like her?"
She flushed.

"Oh, it's not that. I think she's simply beautiful, but—oh, I'm such a bad one at making new friends."
"You made friends with us easily enough, my dear," said Miss Varney affectionately.

Mary could think of no reply. The book had fallen from her knees; she stooped and groped after it at the same moment in which David bent to pick it up for her, and their hands touched.

Mary drew her away sharply, and there was a little additional color in David's face as he laid the book down on her lap.

The silence was unbroken save for the click, click of Miss Varney's knitting needles.

"I am going to show you over the old part of the house after dinner," David said suddenly. "You said you would like to see it, and there is a moon to-night."
She looked up interestedly.

"What has that got to do with it?"
"Everything. The old wing looks only its best by moonlight."
"Oh!"

"And the ghost always walks by moonlight," said Miss Varney.

Mary gasped her hands rather tightly in the lap of her frock.

"Perhaps you shall see her, then," she said, with forced lightness.

Miss Varney shook her head.

"In my opinion she never existed, my dear. I've never seen her, and I've much doubt if anyone else has. Dear me—not dinner already?"
(To be continued.)

A Dead Airman.
May's tapestry of green and gold was hung about us fold on fold. Where, in the copse, the cuckoo calls. A scented breeze on the walls.
Of space and time, that held us close As bees are garnered by the rose. And we two, walking in that wood, Had half forgot the mire and blood.

(Forgive us, you who sleep in France!)
We half forgot, and then some chance Or some stern angel led the way Through quiet fields to where he lay Dead, beneath his broken wings,
Dead, who had known but twenty Springs.
Still, where a million pulses beat,
Face downward in the young green wheat.

That wreath, gaunt and angular,
Had washed above us like a star
An hour before. Its course was done;
Finished; and one more woman's son
Had cast the cloak so dearly bought,
With patience and in travail wrought
For nine long months, worn twenty years,
How gaily! Now Fate's awful shears
Had rent it, and the naked soul
Slipped out at once.
To see life whole
One needs good eyes, but only God
Can so view death.

Of a million British war graves scattered over the battlefields of Flanders and France and the Near East, practically the only one uncared for is that of Rupert Brooke, the English poet killed at Gallipoli, who wrote the lines: "If I should die, think only this of me: That there's one corner of a foreign field That is forever England."
Only just now has the attention of the British public been called to the astounding fact that isolated on Scyros, a lonely island in the Aegean Sea, the poet's grave is not among those maintained by the War Graves Commission. England might still be unaware of the neglect of Rupert Brooke's resting place if it were not for the approaching St. Barnabas pilgrimage of relatives of the men who died on the Gallipoli peninsula.

The Little Green Pasture.
It was full of sunshine, with tree shadows on the grass, singing birds and wild rose perfume; and except for beauty, I do not know why it was at all. And it would not be right to remember the little green pasture without the tree frogs, cockle burrs and bumble bees. Every rail-fence corner was a castle, with stakes and rider the June bugs danced, and we were sure the hob-wives hid their nests.

I will take you along the narrow path that ran the longest way across the little pasture, and if you can be a little boy or a little girl for a while, we will run. So down the path we go, from the front yard gate past the stile and hitching posts—in your front and me behind—and all the time the silver leaf trees are turning its green and silver leaves just as fast as we run. We cross the little hollow and what a thrill it gives us, but on we go, past the quiet pond resting in its shady banks, clear down to the bars—and there is the great yellow road with the hackberry tree at the top of the hill—the road that leads out to the world, to far-away cities that glitter with mystery, across rolling plains and glowing deserts, to where mountains as high as the sky slope down to the widest of oceans and ships sail away on the sunset.

Long since I have traveled that road and it has no backward turning, but in fancy we are children again in the little green pasture. It is a summer evening now and the sun has just set behind the deep, dark woods across the road, the whippoorwills are calling and we chase the lightning bugs as they go slinking by. White clouds, slender and feathery, trail across the sky. I call them angels but you, of course, know better.

Nancy is coming down the path. I would rather sleep on the sheepskin under the elm trees just inside the gate, but she will carry me to the house and to bed.

The earth: still heavy and warm with afternoon.
Dazed by the moon.
The earth, tormented with the moon's light.
Wandering in the night.
Full moon, moon-rise, the old, old pain of brightness in dilated eyes.
The ache of still
Elbows leaning on the narrow sill.
Of motionless cold hands upon the wet Marble of the parapet.
Of open eyelids of a child behind
The crooked glimmer of the window-blind.
Of sliding, faint, reminding squares
Across the lamplight on the rocking-chairs
Why do we stand so late,
Still fingers on the moonlit gate?
Why do we stand
To watch so long the fall of moonlight on the sand?
What is it we cannot recall?

Poultrymen!
Can YOU answer these 5 questions?
How soon after hatching should chicks be fed?
What would you feed laying pullets to stop them "going off their legs"?
What feed makes chicks mature rapidly?
Why should very little meat and bone feed be given breeding stock?
What feeds contain the vitamins that prevent chicks from having rickets?

The correct answers to these questions are worth many dollars to you—yet you can get them absolutely FREE. The Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, has prepared a booklet, "Poultry Feeds and Feeding," which reveals in simple language the secrets of successful feeding. Tells the best and most economical diets for fattening, a high egg yield, rapid growth, etc. Saves you money in feeds, and brings you bigger profits. Remember, you only have to write, and the Government sends it absolutely FREE!

In the English class a certain boy had been causing a deal of mischief, and to punish him his teacher had asked him to make up a verse of poetry.
To her annoyance he produced the following:
"A little mouse ran up the stairs,
To see Miss Blodgett say her prayers.
"Very well," she said, "unless you can think of something else in two minutes I shall cane you."
The boy cudgelled his brains for a minute, and then he seized a pen, and in a few moments he had written:
"Here I stand before Miss Blodgett,
She's going to strike, but I'll dodge it."

POULTRY INDUSTRY HAS WIDE OUTLOOK

CANADA CHOSEN FOR WORLD CONVENTION OF 1927.

Women Are Responsible for Ninety Per Cent. of World's Poultry Production.

In Canada people are badly needed to take up the poultry profession, according to Professor Edward Brown, English poultry expert, who has been touring the Dominion in the interests of the World Poultry Congress to be held in Ottawa in the summer of 1927, of which he is the president. Certain significance from Canada's point of view attached to a subsequent utterance that women were responsible for ninety per cent. of the world's poultry production.

In almost sensational manner Canada has come to assume a position of outstanding importance among the countries of the world in the poultry industry. No clearer proof of this could be given than the decision arrived at to hold the World Poultry Convention, which is merely the third congress of its kind in Canada next year. This will not be merely a poultry show but a complete exhibition of breeds and varieties, educational features, poultry appliances, etc. Several thousand delegates, representing nearly all civilized countries, are expected to attend, and United States poultry men will be particularly well represented by an elaborate and expensive exhibit. In addition to being a fine tribute to Canada the congress cannot but be a very striking advertisement for Canadian agriculture.

Canadian Breeds in Demand.
It can truthfully be said that Canada scarcely appreciated the worth of her poultry until exhibits went overseas in 1924 to the Wembley Exhibition and the International Congress at Barcelona, Spain, and came into competition with birds from other countries for the first time. In the success and enthusiasm which followed, Canada immediately leapt to an important place in the international poultry industry. Since that time Canadian poultry breeders have come to attach a much greater value to their industry and have been more active and energetic in fostering it. Canadian birds have been in demand in all parts of the world and have been shipped to the Argentine, Japan, England, Fiji, Australia, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, and Ireland, as well as various parts of the United States.

There has been a steady rise in the last five years in the number of hens in Canada, their average production, total egg production in the Dominion, and their total value. Between 1921 and 1925 the number of egg-producing hens on farms rose consistently from 26,755,856 to 32,337,040; the average production per hen from 75 to 82; the total eggs produced from 188,940,154 dozen to 224,778,867 dozen; the average value per dozen from 25 cents to 26 cents; and the total value of eggs produced from $40,988,841 to $57,950,340.

Despite this increasing attention devoted to the poultry industry in Canada, the Dominion is still importing more eggs than she is exporting. Imports have been drastically cut since there has been a slight falling off in exports. In the past fiscal year Canada imported, very largely from the United States, but also from Hong Kong and other countries, 3,241,591 dozen eggs worth $477,127, as compared with 2,650,047 dozen worth $246,819, in the previous year, and 6,512,512 dozen, worth $1,976,707 in the year before that. As against this the Dominion exported, mainly to the United Kingdom but also to the United States, Bermuda, Newfoundland, St. Pierre and Miquelon, and other countries, 2,501,131 dozen eggs, worth $395,349, in the last fiscal year, as compared with 2,650,047 dozen worth $1,000,504, in the previous year, and 2,590,509 dozen, worth $1,027,171, in the year before that.

There is every indication that Professor Brown was right. There is still opportunity for expanding the poultry industry in Canada. This may be effected on mixed farms which account for the greater part of Canadian poultry production, or on specialized small holdings in certain areas of the Dominion peculiarly suited to the pursuit.

ARE YOU...

August is the month for a little relief from the heat of the summer. For a change, a little in preparation for the season. This busy time the coth cutting and the harvest of the beans, of the silo filling, horse mowing, etc. In fact, the let up until autumn sets down for good. The farmer needs a change, a building up of force and energy, just as a city man who works late in an office. A little rest or woman who must occupation can not be lost. Long continued mental effort tends to gradually, to become his own. In short, "stale on the job." What that point is, best to stay away from it all for a time.

Rest at home will not do. He needs to see familiar surroundings, then, then do something, but, something he wants.

The same kind of rest for all of us, to be sent to wash, to clean, to home back, to count, the delicious sauce and low throughout the year. A frequent reminder of the we had. Some of us are "so fishy" as to need just a "cure" around some one of our numerous lakes or streams whose delightful at this time of my tent to a couple of hours the other day for. CARE OF A PIANO
Very few people take care of their pianos, and appreciate them in every way. Pianos become through neglect than they are. Pianos do not improve among the agencies frequently hasten their are lack of tuning, arithmetical dampness.

TUNING
Of first importance in the care of a piano is tuning. A piano is tuned at least once a month, for the sake of efficiency and to keep the piano in good condition. Whether used or not, a piano should never be out of tune, as this owing to the uneven work on the various parts of the piano and soundboard. It is economy to obtain of a reliable and competent arrangement for the piano at regular intervals. Day should be made ending in order that the tuner's disposal, otherwise, if he has to be possible that the piano untuned for too long a time, the various parts of the piano are much in need of being engaged regularly.

CARING FOR THE PIANO
The fact parts of a piano inspection from time to time, the felt in a piano action becomes packed to a white dry dampness and over-dry air which does not adjusted loose parts of the piano and shrinks, out of adjustment, and causes that are much in need of being engaged regularly.

AVOID BOTH EXTREMES
Extreme dryness has a mental effect on a piano, contracts and shrinks its parts. For this reason, a piano should never be out of tune, as this owing to the uneven work on the various parts of the piano and soundboard.
