Must Mimic the Queen.

Whatever the Queen has, the wome of the Empire must have if possible. Last Christmas Queen Mary was presented a curious clock, fitted in the lid of a round gold comfit box. The face, which has platinum hands set with diamonds, is protected with a cover of translucent blue enamel. Now in Bond Street is being exhibited an exact duplicate.

It was written in 1912 and sent on a round of theatre managers, but always it was returned "with compliments and regrets." At last Mr. Edmund Gwenn thought he would risk R. But no; he changed his mind. A few years elapsed, and then the play was shown to Sir Barry Jackson, the outerprising head of the Birmingham Repertory Company. He reduced it in 1916 and it became immediately the "stop-gap" success, to be put on as a certainty when anything else failed.

Skiffs.

Almost concealed by the high bullrushes with their rusty brown blobs and dark green blades, the little boathouse rests at the end of the pathway of locas boards between which flowers like yellow cups holding the fresh rain have s, rung up. The bouthouse, once a bright yellow, is now of nondescrip color, from years of exposure to the whims of wind, rain and sun.

As the planks, currounded like islands with wild flowers and scattered purple thistles here and there, are tred, there is a rustle in the tall weeds, as grasshoppers skip estentatiously at the approach of strangers who dare to break the stillness of the waning autuma afternoon, and a random bird flutters in the discant brush.

The venerable boatman surveys his family of skiffs, his flat-bottomed rowboats, his yawls, his dinghtes. They are his children. They need autumnal care. All summer they breasted the waters of the lake, holding safely on Sunday afternoons between their bulging bulwarks many different people. There were parties with rollicking children and savory basket lunches, older people who dreamed of idvilic days in idle canoes and water craft on other lakes, and young people who had lived such days in the golden summer fust passed. Drawn from the still waters and the soft aftenroon sun, the boats rest in the thry pavilion almost concealed by the bullrushes. Tender hands, though strong and gnarled, are filling up little crevices between the planks, mending oarlocks. The craft with wide bladed cars fashioned from the smooth igmber exuding scents of the forest as it lies piled on the pavilion, are to be given new wings. What a variegated family of the old lake masters are these skiffs! Once resplendent in crimson, or green, or bright yellow, the finger of time has scratched upon them a coat of gray, giving them the grace of age. Theirs is the beauty of an autumn day after the impetuosity of summer. Theirs is the air of repose that blends in the almost deserted park and tranquil lake with nature itself.

White blotting-paper is essential.

Much the best committees from the point of view of material are committees about business which meet at business premises - shipping offices, for choice. One of the Pacific lines has the best white blotting-paper I know; and the pencils there are a dream. I am sure the directors of that firm are dravers; for they always give you two pencils, one hard for noses. and one soft for doing hair.

When you have selected your committee and the speeches are well away, the drawing begins. Much the best thing to draw is a man. Not the chairman, or Lord Pommery Quint, or any member of the committee, but just a man. Many novices make the mistake of selecting a subject for their art before they begin; usually they select the chairman. And when they find it is more like Mr. Gladetone they are discouraged. If they had waited a little, it could have been Mr. Gladstone officially.-A. P. Herbert, in "On Drawing."
