We are not machines; nor do we tain somewhat machine-like habits of Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont. regularity, reliability, punctuality, industry, and thoroughness. We will then work with the smoothness and efficiency of a machine, whilst we need not sacrifice our power of initiative, forethought, and the adventurous spirit of discovery.

There are nobler habits than these, which are only habits of the mind: Are there no habits of the spirit? think so. A man may be efficient, generous; orderly in his work, but disorderly in his emotions. We have all known men and women whose habits seemed to work perfectly in ordinary circumstances, but who lost control and "crashed" when struck by adversity and trouble. They have neglected to form the habit of calm self-containment, which is something higher and more spiritual than stoic-

Good habits, carefully and deliberately formed, often serve us better than great natural gifts, for one bad habit has often proved capable of rendering the greatest gifts almost useless-"the little rift within the lute which, by and by, makes all the music mute."

Good habits are built to stand wear and tear. Being slow of growth they are less liable to fall before "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune."

There is a note of warning which needs to be sounded. We say a person has become the slave of habit. It is a true saying both for the good and the bad. A man may become the slave of a good habit. I have known men so tidy that they got nothing

Lest one good custom should corrupt the world.

And God fulfills Himself in many

So let us see that our good habits ever remain our servants and do not become our masters, for the spirit of a man is higher than any habit he may form.

Very Early.

The country road is covered with morning moisture. It is neither rain, nor frost, nor yet dew; it is, rather, a series of exquisitely toned individual drops lying in strings like fairy beads, and holding the sky within their hearts. It is something actively impressive, bidding one stand and look and question; the tender frailty of tone is new, it is soft and gentle, and a strange delicate warmth as of a very faint breath rises slowly upward from the ground.

Across the roadway lies a little track in the moisture, a perfect pattern of minute, thread-like feet where a bird has run into the wet grass beneath the bushes. A small gray-brown feather is here, too, caught on the edge of a spider's web. It is soft to the touch, and a little warm-something to keep and treasure for a time.

The sun has converted the roadway into a track of golden-red light. The strings of moisture-beads are running together and trickling into the little ruts, and a cart horse bearing on its broad back a whistling boy treads heavily upon the prints of the bird without heeding, and turns great eyes upon you in passing as if to question your indolence.

These are the early morning moments when spring is actively present -very near and very real; when it stands sweetly upon the quiet roads and blinks blue eyes up at the skyand whistles too, maybe, from the lips of a lad as he slowly rolls, by on the back of his unromantic steed, and winks in and out of the tree shadows, and passes into the distance.
