"Lo Chi Fad but one adviser, who never left als side. This man, named Ping, was of small stature and a meek man, yet he was feared by many. And when the mighty war lord spoke, Ping was wont to bow low and say "Yea, my lord; verily it is so,"

"It came to pass one evening that Lo Chi was seated in his tent, having dined richly. Beside him was a bottle of rare wine, from which he would fill his golden goblet from time to time. With him were seated his adviser Ping and another. This other was a fine young soldier, a brave man and held in high esteem by his fellows. Nevertheless he was hot headed and feared no man.

"Lo Chi discoursed on famous victories, battles, conquests and many other subjects. At tength, glancing at the bottle beside him he said, "Well do I remember on one occasion in far distant lands, when an incredible thing happened. My servant, at my bidding, was pouring win into my goblet when, from the neck of the bottle, there came forth a rat.' The young soldier, being amazed, quoth, 'Most strange, sire. Indeed it must have been a very small rat to issue from the neck of a bottle.' Lo Chi replied 'By the gods, it was an exceedingly big rat!' The young soldier meditated and still doubting, said, 'Sire, verily then, it must have been a monstrous bottle.' To which Lo Chi shouted in great wrath, 'By the gods' I tell you it was an exceeding small bottle!
