Strange Fishing

A curious sight in the city of Winchester is angling for trout in the public streets. As most of you know, Winchester in England is on the River Itchen, and into the main stream there run numerous small tributaries. The water of these brooks is exceptionally clear, and trout, often of a good size, abound In the main thoroughfares of the city the brooks, which run along by the edge of the roads, are mostly covered in. When cloths or chamois are to be used in cleaning windows, it is an excellent plan to wipe the panes first with a wad of dampened paper, that of the tissue toweling type being especially good for the purpose. This removes most of the grime so that the other cleaning agents do not get soiled so quickly. Some women follow this plan by merely rubbing with a dry piece of old taffeta silk, which leaves the windows bright and clear. Many home makers who use chamois for this purpose do their window washing between times of loading the washing machine on wash day. Instead of taking the time to wash out the chamois, this arrangement does that work for to the machine, whence it emerges ready for the rest of the windows or

Like the onion and the leek, garlie belongs to the lily family, though its bulb has an entirely different formation. Each bulb is composed of a number of "cloves" or "kernels" guite distinct from one another and encased in a smooth, strong skin. Each clove must be peeled and cut into halves or quarters in order to release the flavor, on of these subdivisions often being sufficient for seasoning a good-sized dish. The remainder of the bulb can be left intact and another "clove" removed when needed, There is no odor from garlic until peeled and cut, so that its presence with other vegetables on hand, even in a small space, is not objectionable. A single bulb can be bought at a time and costs but a few cents.
