COURTS AND OFFICIALS

Dealing with the administration of law and the dispensation of justice in lower courts a correspondent of the Toronto Globe indulges in some caustic criticism of the attitude, believed to be often assumed by representatives of the Crown, "The Crown Attorney," he says, "as a rule is out red hot for conviction. He uses every effort not mererly to present the facts but to press for a verdict of guilty, often on most faulty evidence, and in many cases asks for a severe or even the maximum sentence." This is a serious allegation with the unfortunate' side that, it is believed there are dog A-merr-cur. grounds on which it may be based. pered with mercy is measured by the bearing the outcome may have on the future of an official. The aim should be to dispel such a deprecative idea and thereby strengthen, rather than weaken the law. It can be done by less anxiety and a greater adherence to the practice in England, where the Globe correspondent says "no public prosecutor would dream of doing such a thing. He simply presents his facts to the judge and jury or magistrate, naturally tries to prove these facts by evidence and leaves it at that."
