

The Flying Courier

by Boyd Cable

SYNOPSIS

At Croydon Aerodrome, Glynn Elliman, pilot of the Indian Air Mail Lister, meets Norah Seaman who has come to see some friends.

At the last minute, Glynn is taken off by for a special job. He chats with Norah about this, both wondering if it has anything to do with the press reports of a Prince of Nepal flying to India. He is in London, but in haste to return to India, where his father has died. He must be present to claim the throne, which his half-brother, "The Vulture," plots to seize.

Glynn and Norah part, and at the office of Airways, Glynn receives secret orders.

At the Prince's house, he gets instructions to fly a new machine to London from the factory, for the Prince's use. Agents of "The Vulture" in London hear of this and track him to the factory.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY.
The map—the Airways map, said Stefan, evidently convinced. "At least the Vulture's men can reach the aerodromes half-way from India."

"And if there is an accident at some place like Basra or Bagdad which prevents the Syntax from flying on, it will not be as easy to find another machine there as in London," added Michel.

That night, Glynn Elliman travelled comfortably down to Ribbleston, settling himself in and sleeping most of the way like an accustomed traveller. And in the compartment next to him, Max smoked cigarettes and dozed between them, but never failed to be awake and alertly on the watch at each stopping place to see that Glynn did not leave his compartment.

And in the morning when Glynn descended at Ribbleston, Max also dropped to the platform, keeping his back carefully to Glynn. When Glynn entered the station hotel, booked a room and sent his bag up to it, Max was studying a time-table within earshot of the desk clerk; while Glynn ate a hearty breakfast at the hotel, Max saw him settled to it, watched the desk-girl go off to hers, sauntered up to her relief, gave the number of Glynn's room and got his key, and ten minutes later had been expertly through Glynn's bag (with particular attention to his Passport) and had returned his key to the desk.

After breakfast, Glynn chartered a cab and drove to the aircraft factory on the outskirts of the town, with Max following at a discreet distance in another cab. And while Glynn was being shown the new Syntax-Star, walking round and examining it carefully, Max was telephoning a lengthy but guarded report to Stefan and Michel in their room in London.

Next day there were three lots of people connected with these events busy looking up particulars of air routes to India.

Glynn, thoroughly delighted with the machine he had been trying out that morning, was working out with the test pilot and manager of Hemmings Aircraft Company such matters as fuel capacity, speed, range and distances between aerodromes from London to Karachi.

Stefan and his friends, with less accurate facts of the machine's performance, but with sufficient for their purpose, were doing much the same thing, and noting the likeliest places where an "accident" could be most usefully arranged for the machine or the pilot on the way out—the wrecking of the pilot, as Michel casually pointed out, being just as effective and perhaps more easy to accomplish than that of the machine.

And the third party feverishly hunting out the places along the air route to Karachi was Miss Norah Seaman.

On the Thursday, Glynn Elliman flew the Syntax to a Club aerodrome just outside London, took up the quarters that had been arranged for him at the Club, and telephoned to report his arrival to the Prince's equerry. He also pointed out that he was naturally being asked a good many questions about the machine being there and suggested a little paragraph for the press which might satisfy the questions without giving away any real purpose of the machine's purpose there.

Accordingly, a brief note appeared in the evening papers to the effect that the new Syntax had been bought by a wealthy South African sportsman and would probably be flown out to him soon by an experienced pilot who had been testing the machine.

The camouflage however failed to deceive those most interested in the destination of the Syntax. "It is a blind that might have succeeded," Stefan remarked to Michel—"if we had not known that the pilot flying the machine had called at the Prince's house just before taking the train to the factory."

"There must be no slip in the watch kept on the Prince's house," said Michel.

"No danger of that," said Stefan. "The latest reports are that he is still in bed with night and day nurses in attendance. If he is taken out, it will have to be in an ambulance, and we can't miss seeing that. And another man watches the Club aerodrome where the machine waits."

But on the same day a consultation was held at the Prince's house which looked like upsetting all the careful plans of plotters and counter-plotters.

The specialists had made a full examination again, and after discussion had delivered their opinion from which nothing would move them. If the Prince were moved within a week, they said, they would not be answerable for the consequences; and they would go further and say that if he persisted in attempting the flight to India before then, he would almost certainly have to be removed from the plane before he got halfway, and would probably die in whatever hospital he found—if he were within reach of one at the critical stage.

After they had gone, the Prince, exasperated and almost exhausted by his fruitless arguments and pleadings, discussed the position with Sir Aylmer, with the equerry and Secretary in attendance.

"The reports from Nepalata grow steadily worse," said the Prince. "Have you seen this cabled copy of the leaflets that are being sent round and displayed everywhere?"

Sir Aylmer took the copy the Secretary handed him and read: "To the Priests and People of Nepalata. It is our law that the heir to a Prince who has died must proclaim himself in his capital within seventy days, and your eyes behold his face and your ears hearken to his voice and that so you may know him. One son of our late Prince is in London, injured, dying or dead. The other son is here with his people, and will proclaim himself on the Day of the Feast. He being the only lawfully proclaimed Prince, will then reign and will give rewards to his friends and punishments to his enemies."

Sir Aylmer handed back the copy, and shook his head.

"There was another leaflet," said the Prince, "deriding the report that I might be able to fly. Now, if it has even weakened those who have supported me so loyally up to now."

"Would it not be possible, Your Highness, that the British Government could act?" asked the Secretary.

"If it were officially published that the British and Indian Governments supported the claim of Your Highness, would it not weaken the hold of the other party?"

"I'm afraid," struck in Sir Aylmer hurriedly, "I'm afraid that cannot be done. I have already raised the question privately, and am assured, privately but authoritatively, that our Government cannot interfere. The whole matter is one of the laws of Nepalata, and the voice of the priests and people. There is no precedent for British interference with the domestic affairs of the State of Nepalata."

"There is precedent for the fire and slaughter that will assuredly come on the Day of the Feast," said the Prince grimly. "And for British bayonets being called in to restore peace and law—as after the Moplah rising."

"I see nothing for it," said Sir Aylmer despairingly, "but to fall back on the other suggestion—that you make your proclamation here in the presence of witnesses who will sign and swear to it. Then send the sworn copies out by air."

"They would be discredited and disbelieved as the official reports have been," said the Prince wearily. "And no proclamation made here would be within the law of Nepalata. Read again what the leaflets said on that."

The Secretary lifted it and slowly read the extract—"... must proclaim himself in his capital within seventy days, that your eyes may behold him and your ears may hear his voice, and that so you may know him."

Out of the silence that followed, the voice of the equerry broke sharply, excitedly—"Highness, Sir Aylmer—I believe I have it. It might fail, but it's—a chance."

"True," said the Prince quietly. "You have that English saying about a drowning man and a straw. Speak out."

"A film—a talkie!" cried the equerry. "Make your proclamation on a talking film, send it out by air, and let the people see and hear it."

"A talk film," said the Prince, and laughed shortly. "Truly, I have often cursed the evil they have brought to India. It would be coals of fire if now they helped me. Can such a thing be done—the film be made in time?"

"It is most—I mean," stammered Sir Aylmer, "I don't think there is any precedent—I mean—is there?"

The Prince laughed again. "There is never a precedent until one is set, yet many have been set."

"It can be done in time most certainly," said the equerry, answering the Prince's question. "A horse race on the screens of the theatres the same evening."

The Prince repeatedly softly the words of the Law—"that your eyes may behold his face and your ears may hear his voice, and so you may know him for your Prince."

"But—but—is it your face, your voice?" said Sir Aylmer, still in rather shocked tones. "I mean would it—from a film—be held legal in the Courts?"

But now the Prince was chuckling. "It is an excellent question—and the argument for and against it being within the law will assuredly keep the people busy—perhaps until I can ride at the head of my troops to settle it. But argument follows the cause of it. At least we provide the cause. It is enough. See to it, quickly."

The Prince of Wales And a Yorkshireman

A few days ago, visiting unemployment centres in Yorkshire, the Prince of Wales came to the bleak mining town of Barnsley, famous as the home of Barnsley chaps and Herbert Smith. Mr. Smith had been the president of the Miners' Federation and was "Ahr Erb" to a million miners. It was a nickname of proprietorship, for Mr. Smith was a pit-boy before he was ten. His childhood was spent in some of the bitterest poverty in the country including the workhouse.

Now in his seventies, he is such a man as only Yorkshire can produce. He is grim, gruff, blunt, down right and decided. In a cloth cap and muffer, with a deadly pipe slung between his teeth, he is a vast bulldog of a man with the temper of an auto-crat and the thick brogue of the West Riding of Yorkshire. A man who says what he means and means what he says.

At luncheon in Barnsley, the Prince sat with the Mayor on one side of him, Mr. Smith on the other, and a Barnsley chop before him. (The fame of Barnsley chops is due to their size; as they weigh a pound and a quarter, only two of them can be cut from one sheep.) Unemployed subjects at the luncheon.

When the speeches began it was Mr. Smith, one of the oldest, hardest and greatest of British trade union leaders, who proposed the Prince's health. Heaving himself to his feet with something of the massive effect of a heavy howitzer getting into position, he talked of the hope with which his class looks to the Prince. He ended with his stolid peroration: "I had a long conversation with your dear mother and father at Buckingham Palace—and I have not forgotten it. They knew I were a Yorkshireman before I came away. I am putting my confidence in you, and I hope you may long be spared to go on pursuing your work."—London Correspondence of the New York Times Magazine.

Girl Wins Dental Award

For the first time the most coveted award of the London School of Dental Surgery has gone to a girl. She is Miss E. L. B. Stammer, of Willsden, England, and the award is the Saunders Scholarship, the holder of which is regarded as the senior student in the final year of the course. Miss Stammer also took prizes in dental surgery, bacteriology, and dental diseases in children, and a certificate of honor in radiology. The school will not admit women students hereafter.

Teach Children Meaning of Order

Youngsters With Proper Training May Do Much to Ease Burdens of Busy Mother

The other day a little fellow was at our house and sat up at the table to dine. We had no high chair, having passed ours along, so he had to be bolstered up with two green pillows from the living-room.

Perhaps you won't believe us when we tell you that this baby of two years and four months slid down when he'd finished his cereal and baked apples, allowed his napkin to be untied and then gathered up his pillows and marched them back to their accustomed place without a word or suggestion from any one.

Every one was surprised, but his mother said, "He does that at home. If I tell him to clear up his nursery he pushes his little table and chairs back to the wall, puts his toys all in a corner and lays the odds and ends in a pile on the couch. I don't have to tell him now, or name each piece. He picks things up like a grown person."

"How in the world did you ever teach him?" every one wanted to know.

Result of Training.
In the first place she is what we call a "merry" mother. She has a habit of making a game out of everything. Another custom of hers is to say "we" instead of "you" and working "with" him.

The little fellow has been trained to all sorts of things without knowing he was being trained. And that's more than half the battle.

This idea of making a game of a number of things was used to advantage by a friend of ours. Her little girl for some unknown reason tired of milk and was drinking far less than the doctor ordered. The mother worried about it and the doctor suggested giving the child milk in the form of a flavored malted beverage. This, too, the child refused, asking for water instead. However, mother got a bright idea one day. They were playing train and mother announced that it would soon be time for the "man who sells drinks" to come around. Thereupon she left the room, returning a few minutes later wearing a man's hat and carrying two glasses of the milk drink the doctor said the child should have. "Nice drinks," she called, "ten cents each. Who wants one?" "I do," said her little daughter, and mother handed her a drink and pretended to collect the ten cents. The child drank the milk down sweetly, while mother also partook of the same beverage. After playing this game a few times, the little girl became so fond of the drink that she began asking for it of her own accord.

But about children clearing up after themselves. We see children of two, four, six, eight, twenty, forty, and eighty who have never learned to pick up a thing after they've dropped it or put things right after they've been disturbed.

It isn't their fault. A child has to be taught. When he is ten it's too late. When he's eight, or even six, it's almost too late. Neatness must be absorbed with the milk in a nursing bottle. When children are two or three they should have some idea of order.

Moreover, they need not always be waited on. It is absolutely amazing to see the things some children of two and a half or three can do for themselves. Wash and dress themselves, and feed themselves—if not perfectly, at least enough to help out on a busy day—and even bathe themselves. They can put on their own wraps and overshoes, too.

Tying shoes and buttoning hard buttons will be more difficult. It takes the smartest child some time to learn to tie a bow or even a knot. Buttons will be mastered first.

However, the principal thing for a mother to realize is that little children are not helpless. They can be taught to ease her burden, to help keep the house in order, if she will only take time to teach them.

Mystery Surrounds Russian Women's Army

What is the mystery about Russia's women soldiers?

According to a London news agency battalions of women soldiers in Soviet Russia are undergoing strenuous training in a general drive to weld the Red Army into a more efficient fighting unit.

"The women soldiers are drilled in exactly the same way as the men," he reported, "but they are not conscripted for service, their battalions being entirely composed of volunteers."

"It is fairly well known that there are several battalions of infantry, artillery and sappers composed entirely of women."

But another newsagency stated that they had been unable to confirm the existence of women troops in the Soviet armies.

And an official of the Soviet Embassy told the London Sunday Chronicle that he had no knowledge about the alleged Soviet women battalions.

He could neither deny nor confirm their existence.

"All I know I read in the papers," he added.

Modish Creations For The Bathroom

A well outfitted bathroom makes the daily bath a real joy. And, speaking of "outfitted," we don't mean fixtures of shining metal or landscapes on the walls, but things you use when you take a bath.

Huge cakes of soap are really more economical than those of medium size. And they're much more fun to use. Rough wash cloths and a long handled bath brush should always be hanging within reach of the person who is taking a bath.

Bath ensembles assure you of non-conflicting perfumed odors. If your soap and bath salts are the same scent as your bath powder, the effect will be more pleasing. The same is true of toilet water.

Many prefer toilet water to bath powder, and others use both. But for the sake of your guests it is a good idea to have a little jug of toilet water in the guest bathroom. Bath oil sometimes takes the place of bath salts. A few drops of it soften and perfume the hardest water.

Why not invest some of your beauty budget money in bathroom luxuries and see for yourself how pleasant the daily bath may be?

Home-Making In Distant China

Pigs and Chickens, Dogs and Cats, Sleep in Houses Which Are Built With Few or No Windows

Writing to the Women's Page editor of the Toronto Globe, a woman missionary tells of homemaking in China: "Homemaking in China is very different from homemaking in Canada. I shall describe one place, which is typical of the poor, or even middle class, home of South China. The floor is mud, which is almost as hard as cement. On the right as you enter the door is a bed made of boards, and placed on a stand about two feet from the floor. This is covered with a mat, and during the day they sit on it to do their work or eat their rice. In the middle of the room is a table, on which they place their food. This table, as well as the whole house, is thoroughly cleaned once a year. It is almost impossible to make a Chinese understand that to keep a place clean is so much better than to clean it after it is dirty. I might say, though, that lately my own cook has begun to take a pride in keeping the aluminum pots clean, for they always look so nice, and I do not hesitate to tell him so. But coming back to the little Chinese home, as I enter the woman is sitting on a low stool, with a small table in front of her, shelling watermelon seeds to be used for moon-feast cakes.

EARTHENWARE POTS.

"I have tried my best to think of some places in Canada to which I could compare the Chinese kitchen, but have failed. Anyhow, the stoves are open earthenware pots, into which the wood or grass is put; a kettle is placed on top, and the rice cooked in this way. When the rice is prepared, then they take a huge frying-pan, much deeper than ours, and prepare their other food.

"The smoke has no outlet, so it settles around the room and makes the walls black. The floor is littered with wood or grass for burning and the family pig or chickens. I have more than once had to step over a pig or have one come and lie down with a grunt by my side. Most of the homes, especially the heathens' are built with few or no windows, as the fewer they have the less likely the evil spirits will enter the building.

"The doors at the front and back are closed up tight at night to protect them from thieves; the whole family of pigs, dogs, chickens, and cats brought into the house also. Is it any wonder that so many of the natives are sick? It is always a wonder to me that the children live at all. Most of the bedrooms are inside rooms with no light whatever, except what comes in through the small door.

"If you will come and have a meal with me in January I will serve you a lettuce and tomato salad, fresh from our garden, and strawberries with whipped cream (if the canned cream will whip; if not, beaten egg white). Then there will be plenty of bananas also, if the thieves do not get too many. We have more than 10 bunches coming on now. Our garden is best from December to April; after that it is too hot for anything to grow. This year we had about 30 pineapples, and I used them mostly for jam. The Chinese use them quite a bit with beef."

Acreeage Reduction Is Held Unlikely

Regina.—Possibilities that Saskatchewan farmers will be faced by compulsory wheat acreage reduction when they sow their 1934 crop are remote, according to Premier J. T. M. Anderson.

The manner in which Saskatchewan will fulfill its share in lopping 4,000,000 acres off Canada's area is not known, but details of the province's policy are expected to be announced shortly by Hon. M. A. MacPherson, Attorney-General and treasurer.

While hundreds of Parisiennes prepared elaborate toilettes for the evening festivities, Worth displayed sports modes designed with trim, clean-cut lines, with skirts 12 inches from the ground.

Colors shown were characteristically green, tea green, gray beige, navy, pale blue and white.
