Meets Huey Long Down in Louisiana

Miss Macphail's Weekly Letter

I have been south again. I have picked roses and strawberries and have seen grass ready to mow.

It came about this way; when I visited Baton Rouge in January this year I met and came to know President Smith of the University and Dr. Pipkin, Dean of the Graduate School, whose ancestors came from the Scotch-English border and whose continued love of British institutions was emphasized by his three years of study at Oxford.

It was thrilling to come suddenly into summer. When night fell the train was speeding somewhere between Chicago and Baton Rouge and there was only a suggestion of green over the fields.

President James Munroe Smith had gathered for the occasion of the Jubilee, representatives of almost every seat of learning in the United States and had arranged for the carrying out of a program which was an education in itself.

We have been hearing that Huey runs the State University. Further, that he runs the State, and that there is some fear that he may run "these United States."

Huey Long was easily the most arresting and fascinating figure attending the Diamond Jubilee on April 9th-12th. Not that he lacked competition: the French Ambassador to Washington, the Italian Ambassador, with all the prestige of their old and famous countries, did not out-rank him; nor did the scholars, though their degrees threatened to exhaust the alphabet.

Senator Huey P. Long was on the Campus only one afternoon, the occasion being the visit of the Italian Ambassador, His Excellency Augusto Rosso. The day was bright and beautiful and the pageantry provided by the dress parade of the cadet corps was colorful and, if one could forget the ultimate end of cadets, enjoyable to watch.

Thousands of people were on the parade grounds, the dignitaries were on the stand, and still Huey had not arrived. I had been talking, an hour or two before, to President Smith and Dean Pipkin and they did not know whether or not he would appear.

Governor O. K. Allen, who understudies for Huey, was prepared to act, as head of the State, if the most notorious and most feared Senator did not turn up. But just at the psychological moment a ripple of applause, starting a half mile or more from my position, announced the arrival of the senior Senator of Louisiana. Unaccompanied he strode joyously along, walking with an easy, swinging stride, waving and bowing in recognition of the acclaim he was receiving.

It struck me as significant that when the affair was over and the Italian Ambassador had passed through walking with President Smith the crowd remained just as they were until Huey Long passed down the green lane and immediately a great gallery of people followed him wherever he went and finally across the Campus to the vast hall where the luncheon in honour of the Ambassador was being held.

President Smith, not knowing that the Senator would be present at the luncheon, had arranged for Governor O. K. Allen to extend the official welcome to the Italian Ambassador. He freed the whole assembly from embarrassment by announcing that the Governor had asked Senator Long to substitute for him. The supreme power wielded by Huey P. Long is cloaked by a seeming consent.

The loud speaker and broadcast-apparatus had been fixed for the comfortable use of speakers of average height. This left Huey towering head and shoulders above the microphone. He had not been speaking 5 minutes when I knew that, with all his faults, Huey Long is an elemental force which cannot be ignored. An unscrupulous dictator and demagogue he may be; rude and uncouth he certainly can be. But he has a devastating charm of manner when he cares to exercise it, and can by the very simplicity of his address reach the hearts and minds of his audience.

Speaking with a pronounced drawl and using the Southern vernacular, he proceeded to say that, before welcoming the very distinguished visitor whose country had given so much of art and literature to the world, he wanted to deal with a local matter. (Printed words cannot convey the beauty of the soft southern speech)

"I hear," he said, "visitors have been asking President Smith if Huey P. Long 'interferes' in the affairs of this University. The President says I do not. I just want to take this opportunity of correcting James Munroe Smith."

"In an institution of this kind," Huey continued, "somebody must be prefitted to face the world, and with us that man is our President, James Munroe Smith. But someone must get 'blacked up'—and AH'S R."

He then went on to say that when he first became Governor the appropriation for the University was a round $400,000 while today it is crowding 2,000,000.00. That, while teachers all over the United States had had their salaries lowered, in Louisiana salaries had been sustained or raised.

"Why," asked the Senator, "shouldn't a teacher be better paid than a man who runs a slot machine in a hotel lobby?"

He pointed out that they economized in the Governor's offices and mansion the while they supplied free text books in the schools. "Ah'll say Ah's interfered!"

Referring to the cadet display which we had just witnessed the Senator said: "We train people to die, and I am informed it takes only half as much to train people to live, and I'm all for the latter method!"

He went on to say that many people deplored the part that the politician had played in improving education in the State. It had even been said that politicians were thieves. But if that were so it was well that they should steal for the 'little chillun'....."and Ah'm that kind of a thief!"

In referring to the Jubilee celebration commemorating the 75th anniversary of the founding of the institution Senator Long said: "I know little about the first 70 years but I'll back MY FIVE against them."

After which he welcomed the Ambassador.

To give you a rounded picture, however, I must tell you of a note which was written and pushed across the table to me by a University graduate,....written on the back of one of the beautifully gotten up programs...."I was one of the fellows kicked out of a teaching job because my family had four votes whereas the family of a less qualified teacher, had eleven votes. Votes count. I came here hitch-hiking and have remained. Dr. Smith had taught me at South Western when I was an undergraduate and I confidently turned to him in my distress, and am taking post-graduate work."

The most beautiful pageant of all was the gowned parade of Faculty and visitors passing from the administration building down a torch lighted avenue to the Greek theatre, which is a reproduction of the open air theatres of ancient times, its vast stage a green sward, the backdrop century-old trees close planted and carrying the eye upward to the starlit sky.

The pit of the theatre the "Bowl", is semicircular in shape and rises against a natural hillside and accommodates very comfortably the great audience.

It was an impressive and colorful sight with the many colored hoods of different universities and the occasional brilliant red of an Oxford gown. In this setting the honorary degrees were conferred on the Ambassadors and by far the most learned address delivered by George S. Counts, professor of Education, Columbia University, New York.

Space does not allow a review of his magnificent effort, but one sentence you must have. In deploring those people who still maintain that the liberty of the "big fellow" must not be interfered with Dr. Counts said he was reminded of this: "Everyone for himself, and God above all," said the elephant as he danced among the chickens.

And I, under the southern sky, was suddenly reminded of Canada Packers Limited and the Imperial Tobacco Company.

The South is awakening for the first time since the Civil War. Its sons and daughters of science and learning, of literature and art, are returning home from the metropolis of the North. Youth is on the march and a great agrarian movement is shaping.
