DIGGING POTATOES

Harvesters Should Use Care. - Serious Loss From Mechanical Injuries.

vincingly that potatoes produced on Potatoes produced under such conditions, therefore, should be handled very carefully. While it is true 10th Brantford Troop acted as guard that potatoes grown in dry soil have of honour for the float. At the cemecomparatively tough skins, and for tery they helped distribute flowers this reason are less liable to injury, nevertheless, they are very often injured through the fact this type of soil is not carried over the digger. To compensate this disadvantage, when elevator diggers are used, with us sufficient soil should be taken up to prevent the tubers coming into direct contact with the moving parts of the machine. Authorities agree that diggers should be at least 24 inches wide and the spade operated deep enough to avoid cutting the tubers. The careful farmer pads, not only the digger chain, but also all hard and solid parts of the machine with which potatoes may come in contact. While the digger is the offender in causing mechanical injuries, it is ackowledged also that considerable damage is inflicted when the tubers are picked and hauled to the cellar. It has been determined experimentally that tubers are injured but very slightly when poured from a basket into a sack from a height of 12 inches; when poured from a height of 30 inches, however, injury by cracking and bruising is very severe. Potatoes, therefore, should be rolled or poured carefully from baskets into the bags. Further precautions against such injuries are as follows: Leave the potatoes exposed to the sun and the air for two or three hours; do not drop the filled sacks; on the floor of the barn or cellar; pad the picking baskets with at least one layer of burlap. - Experimental Farms Note.

Measuring Seeing

New Device Tells How Much Light a Reader Requires

Eighteen-year-old Jimmy can read a printed page by dimmer light than grandpa. How much extra light does grandpa need? Dr. Matthew Luckiesh and Frank Moss of the Lighting Research Laboratory, Nela Park, Cleveland, Ohio, make it easy to answer with their new visibility meter.

The instrument looks like a newfangled opera glass. Hold it up to your eyes and turn a little wheel on top as you look at a printed page When you are all through you learn from two eyebrow scales just the amount of light you require for reading or seeing clearly.

There are no lenses in this instrument - only windows. You look through the windows at an open book - anything printed. Twirl the wheel on top and colorless filters are rotated one by one in front of the eyes. You stop when the print is barely discernible.

The eyebrow scale on the left indicates the exact amount of light that you need (in foot-candles) for reading print of the kind at which you have been looking. The one on the right appraises visibility according to units on an arbitrary scale.

This right-hand scale ought to be useful in determining how visible the type that you are reading on this page would be on paper of different finish. In fact Luckiesh and Moss say that public highway officials can tell by means of this scale alone how safe road signs and signals are from the standpoint of visibility.
