much of synthetic products, and rightly so, since they are necessary to modern living and influence our daily lives more than we realize.

Some of the necessities and comforts of life we can get directly from nature, but nature has no seen fit to supply us directly with everything we need and desire. And in the case of certain products which nature has furnished, the supply is not sufficient for our demands. She has, however, supolied the necessary raw materials from which man can make what he wishes, if he only knows how to go about the job. Through years of study and research, the chemist has learned animals, and - what is more important - how to use the resulting "bricks" and "building blocks" to make synthetic materials. Certain of these synthetic or man-made materials are identical with those supplied by nature, as in the case of camphor now made by the chemist from ordinary turpentine, which could not be distineven by the camphor tree itself of far-away Formosa. It is different, however, with the manmade fibre, rayon, which the chemist makes from cellulose derived from the spruce tree and cotton linters. This synthetic fibre, made by a process somewhat like that used by the silk worm, and sometimes made in filaments which are | vided by nature.

Another man-made product sometimes called "synthetic rubber," has the good qualities of rubber without certain of its shortcomings. But it is chemically different from rubber, and therefore not actually synthetic rubber. And the plastics used in making beautiful toilet articles of delicate pastel colours are things nature forgot to make. Nature also failed to supply us with the rainbow of bright fast dyes which the chemist makes from coal tar.
