As I hurried from the tap, I beheld the landlord's baby Sitting in its mothers lap "Look here, dear father," said the mother, Holding forth the little feet, "Look, we've got new shoes for darling! Don't you think them nice and neat?" You may judge the thing was simple— Disbelieve me if you choose-But, my friends, no fist e'er struck me Such a blow as them small shoes. And I was forced my brained to reason-"What right," said I, standing there, "Have I to clothe another's children, And to let my own to bare?"
It was in the depth of winter;

Bitter was the night and wild; And outside the flaring gin shop Stood my starving wife and child. Out I went and clutched my baby, Baw its feet so cold and blue; Fathers! if the small shoes smote me What did those poor bare feet do? Quick I thrust them in my bosom; Oh, they were so icy chill! And their coldness like a dagger Of money I had but a trifle, And I went to work next day: Since that day I've been teetotal
