George Bradford's Wedding Present. Dear reader, my hero is nothing but a baker; so if you are of the high-bred, aristocratic sort, who cares only for a narrative of partisan joys and sorrows, please pass on, for there will be little here worthy of exciting your interest—nothing in this baker being in the least calculated to raise him in your estimation; for he had never a right to the child, who was growing very dear to him, but found that little Daisy had no near relatives, and upon settlement of her father's affairs it was discovered that his financial matters were so much embarrassed, that after settling with his creditors there would remain positively nothing for his child.

He had been all about the neighborhood of all Daisy's friends and acquaintances, finding nowhere what he sought. William Taylor was away from home, greatly to George's vexation, for, remembering his interview with Daisy that morning, he felt almost convinced that he might be able to tell something of her whereabouts.

He hurried back to the city with the sleeping babe still clinging to him, and took her directly to his own little home, saying reverently to his astonished old friend and housekeeper, Sarah Pratt, who met him at the door: "She has come to fill the empty place for a little while, Sarah."

He was disturbed by the entrance of an old man, a neighbor, whom he had not seen that afternoon, and who came in hesitatingly, with downcast eyes, and faltering: "I hear you have lost the young lady, George?"

George Bradford's Wedding Present. Now comes an item which I am very glad to put forward in regard to my ugly duckling, who seems to have so few claims to distinction. He was in love, and, for the object of his affections, I have no cause to blush, as she was a young lady of good family, and lived in a thoroughly genteel house at some distance from the baker's establishment.

George, standing still in his bewilderment, while his guilty joy was almost too evident; but William was too much absorbed in his own misery to notice his friend's manner. "Yes, there is no help for me," said George. "But she will change her mind," said George.

He had resumed his visits again, and the first embarrassment over, always found a cordial welcome from both Daisy and George. George went about all the time as if in a joyful dream, not daring even yet—the morning before the wedding day—to believe in his own great happiness.

That was a terrible night for George Bradford—a night which he never could think calmly of afterwards. In the morning he went about his occupation as usual. This was to have been his wedding day, and very, and very nearly the slow hours passed away which he had expected to pass so differently.

It was very dreary to think of his home without Daisy, but somehow the thought of her making another man's home was infinitely worse—perfect wormwood and gall, in fact—and at last one day George reluctantly and slowly woke up to the astounding fact that he was reluctantly and deeply in love with Daisy himself—Daisy, whom he considered so vastly his superior in position, in intellect and in everything else. The discovery was a very disquieting one, for what chance had an old fellow like himself—a baker, too—against a gay, handsome young man like William Taylor, so eminently suited to Daisy in every respect? Then, too, he fancied that the young girl's manner to him had grown less demonstrative, more reserved, but that might be because she was no longer a child; and he knew that two or three old

Waterloo village has 2,015 souls. St. Thomas' total population is 6,446, an increase of 492 in 1877. An accident, resulting from the careless handling of fire-arms, happened recently to Mr. H. Shartridge, of Mans Road. While cleaning a revolver one of the cartridges was accidentally discharged, the ball passing through the palm of his hand. REMARKABLE RESULT.—A correspondent writes us that during the thunderstorm on the evening of the 2nd inst., the lightning entered near the top of the bank on the west side of the river Saugenee, about half a mile down the stream from Petrol's (formerly Reel's) mill, to a depth of from fifteen to sixteen feet making a large cavity and depositing the excavated earth in one mass at the river's edge. So heavy was the shock that it shook Mr. W. H. Ryan's house quite plainly. Other buildings were also shaken, but no damage done.—Confederate.
