EVE HARWOOD.

CHAPTER VII. It was some two years and a half after cross my path again." Jim Harwood's arrest ere Le had become reduced to this condition, and then he once more dissappeared from Eve's ken; but whether he had left the town, or from withdrawn himself from her notice, she did not know. The story of his decline and fall was a very simple one. Having s rved his articles, he obtained an engage ment as draughtsman in a Mancheste firm. Shortly afterwards his mother had died, and though her income had died with her, she had left him savings to the amount of upwards of a thousand pounds. Possessed of this money, and with no one to control him, he "launched out" in dis sipation, one result of which was that he was discharged from his situation, and could not obtain another.
