States to the prairies of the West continues to go on. The Southern planters have resorted to every possible means to hinder it, even going so far as to make transport by vessels dangerous and thus steamboat companies refused to carry negroes. However to the credit of the Northern States, several benevolent societies sent down steamers for the purpose of offering a free passage to all who wished to move. It becomes increasingly evident that the abolition of slavery in the Southern States is more ap parant than real, and that wherever planter can exercise the tyranny of the slave-owner it is done. However, this state of things is passing away, and, as the Chinese do not take to the ways of the Southerners, necessity will compel them to accord the negroes the rights and liberties of freedom as well as the name.
