-It is announced that Dr. Licks of Penn sylvania has discovered a method of transmitting and reproducing light at any given point by means of an istrument called a diaphote, something in the same manner as the telephone transmits sound and reproduces spoken language at any point however distant from the place where the words were uttered by the human voice. The difference being that whereas in the telephone the words spoken are transmitt ed without change, in the diaphote the light seems first to be converted into electricity and the electricity afterwards converted into light at any given point. The principle-conservation of energy-is not new but the application of it seems to be.
