POETRY

For the Review. EVA'S VOW.

I was walking in the garden, On a bright eve long ago, When I heard a gentle sighing In a voice subdued and low.

It was youth, full and handsome, With a firm and graceful tread; She was young—scarce eighteen summers Had passed lightly o'er her head.

"Dear Eva," he fondly murmured, "How I love you, I can't tell, But I know you love me not, So I've come to say farewell."

"May the one you love be constant, Your wish will please me best, May he strive to make you happy, As I know you'd be with me."

"I will see you often," was the reply, and then, with a tenderness like a woman's, the young man added: "I will ask you to help me as much as you can, knowing it will be a labor of love to you."

"It will, my dear," she said, "I will be glad to do anything for you, if it is for your sake, and I will be glad to see you often."

law, and promised to become a leading man in his profession. But two years ago he left Wentworth abruptly, and I never suspected the cause of his absence until now.

"You think Alma refused him?" "I think your father told him his love was vain: one, I remember now some words of his to which I wanted the clew. From the time Leonard left he became anxious for your return, although he never spoke of it as likely to be hastened, until he was ill."

"Leonard Walton! Where is he now?" "In Boston, teaching in a public school. Not following his profession?" "He has not one dollar upon which to live until clients come."

"Ah! Well, with a heavy sigh, 'I must go. God grant I may do what is right!' 'There is no fear about that,' said the doctor, with a sudden mist over his eyes. 'You will send for me if you need me.'"
