

A Story, Interesting as Instructive.

Grand as our sun appears to us, he belongs to an inferior order among the suns. A spectrum analysis by Sechi of six hundred stars shows that three hundred of these exceed our sun in splendor. A second order includes a class of stars resembling our sun, while a third show a class inferior in brilliancy.

The scientific Department of the California contributes some very interesting remarks concerning improvements in the art of milling, developed under the lights of science. Pieces of iron, formerly so hurtful, are now separated from the wheat by magnets. Bran, formerly separated by means of a blower, which carried fine dust throughout the mill, the expense of considerable power, and sometimes caused explosions, is now separated from the flour by electrical electricity, developed at a trifling expense. Science by the aid of the microscope, has shown that good bread cannot be made of flour in which any large portion of the starch globules have been broken by being reduced to dust. The rising of bread, is, in a measure, due to the starch globules which remain whole, while the dust from the disintegrated ones by sifting impair the lightness and quality of the loaf. It is but recently that these facts have become known to millers, and they are discarding old methods and adopting those which will separate the starch globules without pulverizing them.

Every class of women has its defect. The defect in that of the middle class of farmers' daughters (says the New York Tribune) lies not in any inferiority of morals or intellect, but simply in that they have reached that stage of development when they are idle. They are not elevated enough to work with their heads; they have learned to despise household labour as menial; and none other offers to them in the country.

But when their impressions are struck off, when men feel the emotions, learn the thoughts, understand the purposes, and are elevated and inspired by the sentiments which that mechanical arrangement of letters, bits of lead, serve to disseminate, then the printer's machinery becomes a blessing to the human race. So it is in religion. The forms, the observances, and ordinances are nothing, until their impressions are struck off upon our hearts, and we experience fervily, and vitally, the living principles they were intended to convey. There are, in this general statement, three things worthy of note in the interests of personal religion:

(a). The new birth. The Count became a new man in his intellectual, moral, and spiritual nature through the truth brought to bear on him by the peculiar evolution of Providence. This new birth is a radical change in the heart, understanding, and life of men through the truth applied by the spirit of God. Jesus Christ changes the heart of the man whom he deigns to bring to God: he annihilates the moral distance between a holy God and a corrupt heart; first, by the precepts of his Word, and the motives he presents to induce us to love God and despise the world; secondly, by his example which he proposes to our imitation; thirdly by his spirit which motivates the old man and forms the new man within us.

(b). Communion of soul with God. On his becoming a new man, the Count forthwith communed in his heart with God and walked with God in the truth. This is singular in the case of all, who come to know the truth savagely and to profit. Out of the horror of being alone, Out, and forever, of being my own. Into the hands of all things "with Him." Into His arms, there over to dwell, more blessed than word can tell. Out of bitterness, sadness and strife, Out of myself, and all I called life. Into communion with Father and Son.

Into the sharing of all that Christ won. Into the exercise of all that Christ did. Into the hands of all things "with Him." Into His arms, there over to dwell, more blessed than word can tell. Wonderful love, drawing my cup! Wonderful purpose, that never gave me up! Wonderful patience, that waited so long! Wonderful glory, to which I belong!

(c). The life unto righteousness in all the relations of life. On his becoming a new man, the Count was sent forth into the active scenes of life, there to breathe the spirit and to act on the principles of the truth which had transformed him into the newness of life. Every one, when he is born again, becomes a centre to diffuse around him the graces of the spirit. This, indeed, forms a necessary part of the new life. Let us, therefore, give ourselves to exemplify the Christian in small as well as in great things.—A straw plainly indicates the direction of the current. Hence, the best fidelity to Christ is shown in a daily vigilant service to him in trifles, in efforts to honor him in humble, inconspicuous services, such as in good temper in families sympathy with man and beast, honesty in business, liberality to servants, fidelity to employers. These things make up the test discipline. The same strict applies to many things. The best paintings are those where such details as the blades of grass, the leaves of the trees, the lines upon the water, and similar minute points, are most perfectly delineated. Artistic excellency consists chiefly in the complete accuracy which the skillful or the ignorant worker cannot or will not accomplish. The great Italian sculptor, Michael Angelo, was once visited by an acquaintance, who remarked, on entering his studio, "Why, you have done nothing to figure since I was here last." "Yes," was the reply; "I have softened this expression, touched off that projection, and made other improvements." "Oh!" said the visitor, "these are mere trifles." "True," answered Michael Angelo, "but remember that trifles make perfection, and perfection is no trifles." In like manner, the highest form of devotion to Christ consists in fidelity to apparent trifles. For only heartfelt love and abiding recollection of him, as an ever-loved object, will enable his disciples to maintain throughout each day, in word and company, in busy occupation and before his enemies, the duty of honoring him thus continually and in the whole detail of life.
