Miss Fenton, who lives in the adjoining house, said the first sound heard was a hissing, then came a roar, and their house was covered with flying timber, which smashed every window and shattered the house. In Tifft's boiler shop, separated from the wrecked premises by a humble beer house, kept by John Bagley, the skylights were blown in, and every window demolished, but no one was hurt. All concur that there were two distinct a nocks, separated by a brief interval. An old lady, whose name could not be extracted from her said she was crossing along Ohio street when she heard the explosion, and saw something fly across Indiana street amid a shower of timbers. She probably saw the body of the unhappy proprietor, Patterson, and Willie Gibson (the latter a handsome young Scotchman) being blown across the street clean through the plankiog of the shed adjoining Dock Bros. brass works. A most awful sight the body of Patterson presented as it lay there. He was a mass of torn flesh, entrails, brains, hair, blood, and blackened clothing. His head and his boots lay in a confused mass-An awful wreck of manhood. Willie Gibson lay on a heap of snow further inside the shed. He was not nearly so much mangled, nor had be like Patterson, left a torn handful of his flesh upon a prejected splinser of the crushed planking. Crowds, mostly curious, whom a single policeman strove in vain to keep back, pressed around to feast on the hideous spectacle. The same thing was to be seen in the year of Forrest's house, where John Britz was mouning his life away. It seemed impossible to make the crowd stand back and give the dying man air; and there were some who were brutal enough to jest in the presence of this untimely destruction. "Give him air," shouted an officer. "Oh, what does he want of air?" retorted one of the crowd; "he's done with wind, ain't he," and there were a dozen in the crowd base enough to laugh. There were hundreds of women about, and curious enough most of them seemed to regard the whole business as a good show. Said one of them to a reporter: "There's a fellow lyin' around in the alley, and you'd
