At last appeal to the skies.

The powers ofanimate dust,

To it then turned them; 'tis just.

Earth's vein then ait, whose life-blood

Is borne richly on the flood;

All give what is given;

Man alone holds back from heaven;

Children's limb's thy water's love;

Who sport gleefully in the wave;

Source of joy to young or old;

In summer's heat or winter's cold;

Let all poor oppress'd aye lie,

On a peaceful bank to lie;

Or bathe toll-worn feet in thee,

And know, at least, thou art free.

Tis sweet on thy banks to stay

At the close of summer's day;

Latin, full'd to repose;

For the world never knows;

Greatful, to thy side,

Gazing, dreamin' on thy tide;

Pace, bower, and eden, high,

Musting, thou pass me away;

Pouring fourth thy lute of praise,

As the western sun's soft rays

Peers through fleecy clouds between;

Gilding these with golden sheen;

Ere he sinks away to rest,

He hath smil'd, thy bosom press'd,

To gladden this mild May-day.

Genie zephyrs fan my brow

While I muse, gaze on these now;

Cooling life's stream; which ebb-flow,

To heart-beatings comes and goes;

Many streams with joy I've seen;

Thou'ret the idol of my dream;

Many mirths with the sea;

Thou art dearest far to me.

Songs—mirth, live, for ay,

With heaven and earth pass away.

Farewell! for time is swift—feet,

O'er its dark bounds shall we meet?
