REVIEW

Durham, August 18, 1881.

-President Garfield's condition is daily becoming more and more critical. ter lay's bulletins indeed would indicate that the end is not far distant, but still, his at andants profess to have hope, though n t with that buoyancy which has been all along manifested. The members of the Cabinet have been summoned to Washington and Mrs. Garfield has been advised to be prepared for the worst. Conkling is reported as saying that the country is passing through a dangerous crisis, and that the death of the President is the worst thing that could happen to it.

of To the Editor of the Grey Review. Sin :- It is an unfortune circumstance the Clubs of this town and Port Elgin, re- that your good town is naturally divided into two parts Upper and Lower. That division in the past has been a very great hindrance to the prosperity of the town. It delayed railway communication to Durham for many years, thereby retarding its growth, while neighboring towns were in a growing and flourishing condition. And I fear there is too much evidence that this state of things is existing still. Lower town has now gained the as cendancy, and seems determined to exercise its power on every opportunity, while upper town is determined to maintain as much independence as possible. Upper Town is determined to build a road to the station without passing through the business part of lower town, and lower town is determined they shall get no money to do it with,
