A Bit of Newspaper. "Where I look it I don't know," said poor Mrs. Velvete...

"I found it. I have it still," said the gentleman. "Now, madam, whose portrait was in the locket, and what is your name?"

"Richard," he said to her. "Richard," she said to herself. "Richard," he said to her...

"We'd go and see if they don't want help up at the boarding-house," she said to herself. "I could cook and wash dishes...

years old," she thought, "but I'll go and see the advertiser;" and folding the scrap carefully in her glove, she hurried out of the office.

It was in one of the business streets near the City Hall that she found No. 40, and was taken in an elevator to Room No. 5.

He bowed. Mrs. Velvete made a little courtesy, and began: "It's two years and a half ago, and I've just got the paper. Here it is. My bag was brown velvet, and the money was a hundred and fifty dollars, and poor Mr. Velvete's likeness, in a locket, was in the bag. Oh, sir, if you found it and have kept it, you'll save a poor old soul from starvation."

"I found it. I have it still," said the gentleman. "Now, madam, whose portrait was in the locket, and what is your name?"

Vulgar Forms of Composition. (Prepared specially for the Review.) Next to the laws of thought and taste, which have hitherto engaged our attention, come looks which entertain, improve and enrich the mind.

Without entering on the general question as to what is the province of the poet, we may as pertinently to the point at issue, ask in what do speakers or writers show their acquaintance with books?

They show that they do not know all that has been written on the subject which they treat. They cannot, therefore, give a clear and comprehensive, but a meagre, partial and exclusive view of the subject they treat.

he would evidently be beyond the reach of admonition. But if any one feels confident that he is quite safe from all danger of having his judgement biased in favor of what is most liked and most applauded by those around, or of being tempted to overrate the importance and utility of that which he finds the easiest to himself, and in which he is most exact,--if he feels quite secure against all danger of any such temptation, we should then say that he is in the greatest danger.
